Dadd painting freed for export to United States

By Huon Mallalieu

At midnight on Saturday the ix-mouth stop on the export of Richard Dadd's painting "Obe-ron and Titania" expired. No British institution proved able to match the price of £550,000 which was made at Sotheby's last March, despite early hopes that it might have been possible to secure it for the City Art Gallery, Brimingham. The new owner is an American collector who until now has specialized in contemporary paintings. However, he fell in live with the mad nineteenth century Englishman's masterpiece, which is now free to go to his bome in Minneapolis, although it will still be available for suitable exhibitions at Birmingham and

are considered to be the mos important paintings by Dadd, who spent most of his life in Bedlam after murdering his father.

However, on November 22 there will be a chance to acquire a lesser painting by Dadd. This is a small canvas of a group of Bacchanalian heads which could almost be a detail from another painting. It was formerly known as "Circe" and it was given by Sir Philip Sassoon to Lady Londonderry, since that was her nickname in intellectual and political circles in the 1930s. She was at the centre of a group known as the Ark League, whose other members took the names of various animals. The painting will be offered by Sotheby's on behalf of her daughter Lady Mairi Bury.

Religious teaching 'confusion' in junior schools

By Lucy Hodges, Education Correspondent Many children in junior schools have no idea what is meant by religious education, religiou or being religious, according to a report published yesterday by the Christian Education Movement.

Based on research in 11 schois in three local education authority areas, the report found that most teachers involved in religious education in junior schools felt too inexperienced and lacking in understanding of the subject to incorporate it into their teaching. However, they appreciated its importance.

Too often, teachers said. little attention and importance had been attached to it in their training. Mr John Nicholson, the report's author, says: "It was little wonder, in these circumstances, that many children were going into secondary schools with very limited religious comprehension".

The research, which concer trated on inner-city areas, found that secondary children generally knew what religious education was but their attitudes towards it varied.

Many children seemed con fused about the relevance of religious education to thier everyday lives, the report said. That was because of the gap between their experience and the content of most religious education lessons.

"The children's environment was that of an inner city in the industrial north, and it was difficult even for those children from nominally Christian backgrounds to relate to the Biblebased teaching which takes place in most schools.

Ayers Rock rumpus prompts poll

From Tony Dubondin

The Northern Territory Government yesterday called a snap election for December 3. six months ahead of schedule. in protest at Canberra's decision to hand back ownership of Ayers Rock to the traditional Aboriginal owners.
Mr Bob Hawke, the Prime Minister, announced on Friday that the Uluru National Park. which includes Ayers Rock, one of Australia's main tourist attractions, would be returned to six families who live in the vicinity. They will leac the park back to the federal Government, which will pay rent.

Mr Paul Everingham, Chief Minister of the Northern territory, described the decision as another kick-in-the-teeth by Canberra and claimed it would jeopardize a $150m (about £93m) tourist development just outside the park boundary close to Avers Rock.

Canberra's earlier decision in favour of the Roxby Downs uranium mine in South Australia and to allow new contracts to be negotiated for the Ranger mine in the Northern Territory meant that a number of projected uranium mines in the Northern Territory were unable to be started. Mr Everingham also protested bitterly at this.

He said he was calling the government. The Northern Territory, while not a sovereign state, enjoys autonomy, with Canberra retining certain pow-ers. Mr Everingham said the federal Government's approach to relations with the Northern Territory had been provacative.

Now it is quite different. Not only has Mr Clark moved from the White House, but it is no longer accurate to speak of a trimuviate. Return of the missing Hitchcocks

Alfred Hitchcock thrillers have been kept off cinema screens. Peter Waymark reports their reappearance

Alfred Hitchcock was a frugal man, recently, Stanley Kubrick has secured probably as a result of his Jesuit outright control of his pictures, upbringing. His daughter Patricia says: from A Clockwork Orange onwards. "He did not go in for fancy cars, racehorses, yachts or any of the other session by a different route. It had been Hollywood accoutrements. He was made in 1948 for a company called very, very conservative and used to say, 'I never want to risk anything'."
When he died in 1980, he left considerable wealth, mainly in stocks and bonds, and two luxurious Californian estates, one in Bel Air and the other in the magnificent redwoods of Santa Cruz, But there was another bequest to his family, which he jealously guarded and which should provide them with an income as long as the cinema survives: five of his famous films.

from circulation several years before, ordering that all the prints should be destroyed. Some have not been shown, legally at least, since the 1960s, and their long disappearance has led them to be dubbed "the missing Hitchcocks". Just why he should have deliberately suppressed some of his most admired work for so long is the final Hitchcock mystery.

Good news for Hitchcock buffs is that after protracted negotiations, Universal has bought the world rights NFT declined to name the source and to the five for a sum unofficially put at S6m; and that the films are once more available to cinemas and to television. The story of their disappearance and eventual reemergence has as many twists and turns as a vintage Hitchcock

Apart from Rope, the films were made in the 1950s under a deal with Paramount which stipulated that ownership of the titles would revert to much written about by the growing body of Hitchcock admirers, but little seen. Except for Vertigo, for instance, none has ever been shown on British These were pictures he had removed television. When precisely they were withdrawn is difficult to establish: even Hitchcock's agent is unable to supply the answer. The most likely date is somewhere in the early 1970s, though not all the films were freely available before that.

In 1969 the National Film Theatre planned a complete retrospective of Hitchcock's work, confident of being able to obtain and screen all the films The five include two of the best he had made up to that time. For Cinémathèque Française, the Paris would be granted only if the source of the print was revealed.

Fearing that this might lead to an instruction to destroy the print, the the film was never shown. Nor was Rear Window. Neither film, in fact, has ever been screened at the NFT. A further complication in the case of Rear Window was a legal action brought against Hitchcock and Paramount to prevent their showing the film pending settlement of the estate of Cornell Woolrich, the writer on whose short story the film was based.

Withholding films, in the expec-Hitchcock eight years after their first tation that this creates a rarity value cinema release. It is unusual for which can increase the price, is a directors to own their films, but relatively common practice. Chaplin Hitchcock's case was not unique, did it with his features and the Walt Chaplin is probably the supreme Disney company still refuses to release example of director-owners and, more to television any of its classic cartoons, such as Pinocchio and Fantasia, while they are still judged to be popular in

For Hitchcock, however, the consideration seems to have been more than purely commercial. Despite his great wealth, he remained at heart a thrifty Victorian, careful about his money and determined to make the price, it was possible to have prints most of his assets, when the films first reverted to his ownership, he was still earning vast sums from his film and television work and it is doubtful, once the taxman had taken his bite, whether the release of Rear Window and the rest would have been financially worthwhile.

That certainly would have been one reason for holding back. Another, possibly, was that the withdrawal of the films coincided with the burgeoning of a critical cult that had started in France during the 1950s, and was particularly associated with young writers such as Truffaut. Rohmer and Chabrol, and which later spread to Britain and the United States.

Though he gave a long film interview to Truffaut which formed the basis of a splendid book about his films. Hitchcock liked to disclaim any deep motives for his work. He was, though, delighted that so much serious notice was being taken of him and he must have realized that the commercial prospects of such films as Vertigo and Rear Window would thereby be enhanced.

People who sought permission to show the famous five came up against long-standing agent, Herman Citron, a tough, shrewd negotiator with famous Hollywood clients. Leslie Halliwell, who buys films for ITV, recalls: "We had been trying to get these pictures for years. We would get through to Citron and he would ask, 'How much?' When we told him, it was never enough."

The legal non-availability of such desirable films led, perhaps inevitably, to a thriving black market. By knowing the right people, and paying the right made and to mount illicit screenings. Sharp-eyed devotees scanning the programmes of certain London art houses would come across such oblique items as "rare 1950s Hitchcock starring Kim Novak" which, though the title was not given, could only be Vertigo. A code for Rear Window was "a Hitchcock thriller to make you look behind your back". When James Stewart, who appeared in several Hitchcock films (including four of the "five") wanted to show a clip of Vertigo during a retrospective of his work at the Berlin Film Festival in 1982, he was refused. Yet in a little cinema in the neighbourhood, 16mm versions of both Vertigo and Rear Window were being freely screened. It was only with extreme difficulty that the American Film Institute was able to secure an extract from Vertigo when presented Hitchcock with its Life Achievement Award.

By the time of his death, however, Hitchcock, on Citron's advice, had decided to rerelease the five, pending legal clearance and the settling of an acceptable price. Both his agent and family deny a story in wide circulation that he saw the films as a means of buying himself out of a contract with Universal which, he feared, he would be too old and ill to fulfill.

The agreement with Universal to rerelease the films took about three years

Keeping the films out of circulation "was a wonderful decision", Stewart says firmly, "and I think it's worked. People are anxious to see these films again. They are treating them like an event. So many good films have been ruined by television. All the cuts and the commercials on the small screen. People don't want to go out and see it in a theatre after that." Stewart and his wife of 35 years, Gloria, saw Rear Window for the first time in 20 years when it opened at the New York Film Festival in October, where it received a rousing ovation. "It was thrilling for Jimmy." says Gloria Stewart. "When the picture ended the audience began to clap and then they stood spontaneously, almost in unison. and turned to our box. It was like the ocean rising.

Despite his devotion to Hitchcock,

Stewart makes it clear that his own favourite film is still It's A Wonderful Life, in which he plays a small-town banker in a position to do some good. It was directed by the equally legendary Frank Capra. "Hitch and Capra weren't all that different." Stewart remembers. "I tend to associate them together in style and attitude and the way they prepared themselves. They both had complete knowledge of the story they wanted to tell and on screen they both wanted to tell the story more visually than verbally. Hitchcock didn't like to depend too much on the Stewart refuses to believe there was a dark side to Hitchcock, revealed in the Donald Spoto biography. "It's just not there. A dark side as described in the biography has got to come out all the bout with skin cancer, for which he the people who are close to him. I got to know him pretty well and I don't believe there was a dark side." However, he does not dispute the famous Hitchcock quote about actors being like cattle - he simply revises it a little. "He said actors should be treated like cattle and when you think about it. it's not such an insulting thing. As an actor you're told to go here, you're told to go there, and if you're not fast enough - and I was never noted for my speed - they prod you. Mr Hitchcock deserves a place in the cowboy hall of

More seriously, Stewart adds: There was always complete relaxation on a Hitchcock set among the crew members and the cast. I never at any time knew any emotional upset, any arguments of any kind working with him. His routine was pretty much the same no matter where we were - on a Hollywood stage, in Marrakesh or in San Francisco. He would look to see what he wanted in a scene, never through a camera, but as an audience would see it. Then he would make a square with his hands and that means that's what he wants on the screen for the next scene. The cameraman gets behind him and looks, there's no talk, to complete, partly because of the lengthy process of settling the estate but also because Citron, known in Hollywood as the Iceberg, was determined to strike the best bargain. Though other film companies were keenly interested, Universal was almost bound to clinch the deal; Hitchcock was, after all, one of the company's biggest stockholders and a close personal friend of the boss, Lew Chaplin also withheld his films for a long period, but when he finally released them, they had only a modest impact. A plan to show the main features, one after the other, in the West End of London was abandoned in face of box-office indifference. The early signs are that the Hitchcock enterprise will prove more successful.

'Today's audiences are starved of good, classy films'

Rear Window, the first of the five to meta its reappearance in the United Sates, was the hit of the recent New York Film Festival and has been playing simultaneously in three of the city's cinemas. In a few weeks it took more than $300,000 at the box office. A delighted Patricia Hitchcock points out that the film made more money on its rerelease than most of the new pictures that came out at the same time, adding: "Its success shows, I think, that audiences are starved of good, classy films".

The films will be seen in B. itain for the first time at the London Film Festival on November 19 and 20, projected in crisp new 35mm prints struck from the original negatives. ITV has acquired the television rights and expects to start showing the films late next year. The five should also be available during 1984 on video. Unless Vertigo and Rear Window turn out on reexamination not to be the masterpieces that most knowlegeable critics hold them to be, the circulation of these films can only restore a reputation that has been dented in Donald Spoto's recent biography about Hitchcock's final years. If the old man were still around he would certainly have something pithy to say about it all, delivered in that rasping voice which never quite lost its cockney origins.

Additional reporting by Ivor Davis, Los

there's nothing and Hitch sits down in his blue suit and his tie and waits until the camera is set up. Then he says to the actors 'All right, let's do it'.' (Stewart frequently speaks of Hitchcock in the present tense.)

Nor did Hitchcock have any interest in the Hollywood fashion for "motivation" or "method acting". When they were making Vertigo, according to Stewart, Kim Novak asked Hitchcock how her character should be motivated. He told her in a slightly exasperated tone: "Kim, it's only a movie.

For Stewart, Hitchcock was the perfect director. Neither liked to intellectualize about their work.
Stewart still demurs when asked to define his own technique. In general, he believes, "the important thing in motion picture acting is that you try to develop a character and do it so the acting doesn't show and if you're successful in doing this, then believability starts sneaking in, and if you start to get people believing in what you're doing up there on the screen, then you're in pretty good shape."

Rope, Rear Window and Vertigo will be shown next Saturday and The Trouble With Harry and The Man Who Knew Too Much on Sunday at the Queen Elizabeth Hall as part of the London Film Festival. Rear Window opens at the Plaza, London, from December 2. James Stewart will deliver a Guardian Lecture at the National Film Theatre on December 6.

Hair-splitting debates on the claims and aims of art as opposed to craft have prolonged many an education and funding committee meeting. Such pigeon-holing is, however, made to seem pretty sterile by several of this week's exhibitions, not least Tom Phillips's rich and diverse Dante's Inferno project which is at Waddington's until November 26.

The Midsummer Marriage

San Francisco

Michael Tippett's The Midsummer Marriage, almost thirty years past its London première, offers the composer his strongest chance to win a place among the very few modern operas in the regular repertory of international-class houses. Since 1955, critics have been lavish in praise of its expressive, accessible and richly singable score. But they have often been less than compelled by Tippett's aggressively sym-

In a determined attempt to demonstrate the viability of one of his favourite operas. Terry McEwen, the San Francisco Opera general director, along with the director John Copley from Covent Garden and the resident conductor David Agler, have invested much money, energy, time and imagination in this work. The result, a US première, was very nearly convincing.

The apparent story, it will be remembered, deals with a crass businessman; daughter, her lover and a large chorus of their friends; his comic secretary, and working-class boyfriend - half Bottom the Weaver, half Papageno. These real-world folk interact, through a Midsummer Day, with near-naked wood sprites. Grecian ancients, an Egyptian soothsayer and the sublime truths of Hindu scrip-

Karr-Lewis Trio are hardly novices. Eugenia Zukerman, the flautist, travels around the world playing concertos while the double bass and piano duo of Gary Karr and Harmon Lewis have been mesmerizing audiences for a long time now. For it went beyond innocent extroversion. Even in Bach and Rameau (a flute sonata and one of the Pièces de clavecin en concert) points were not made but destroyed by over-emphasis and by visual distractions. Such antics entirely befitted Eugene Kurtz's The Lost Contrabass in Las Vagas, a supposedly jokey piece about the obsession of the lady narrator (Miss Zukerman) with the double bass. I found it completely devoid of humour. Mr Karr's exhibitionism was was evident in the concert given by the Brass of Aquitaine and London under the direction of Richard Harvey. This group is an entirely happy collusion between eminent British and French brass players. Their style is not subtle, even when they are playing Gabrieli Canzonas or transcriptions of Gesualdo and Viadana. But you could not want for a more spectacular sound, and the raw bite of the French players contrasts nicely with the more rounded quality of the English, especially in antiphonal passages. This was not the fault of the players (their leader, Diana Cummings, provided a meticulous and beautifully shaped reading of the solo part in the Haydn) but of the conductor, Martindale Sidwell himself, who sadly had the power neither to co-ordinate (witness the disastrous close of the cadenzas in the Haydn) nor, more important, to inspire.

RPO/Temirkanov Festival Hall/Radio 3

Sibelius's Second Symphony may not aspire to the intellec-tual heights or the concentrated power of his Fourth and Seventh symphonies, but my goodness it makes up for that with its broad, almost Brucknerian vision of the relationship between mankind and his world. On Sunday that sometimes erratic partnership of Yuri Temirkanov and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra got the work just about right. Temirkanov's realization, at once both feverish and spacious, was helped considerably by some impassioned yet disciplined string playing, the like of which is rarely heard in London. in the second movement's oscillations between ominous slowness and a breathless, timid scampering every note, no matter how fleeting, was made to count. The brass were on form too, both here and in the finale.

That movement may be conventional in form, but in this performance its stature seemed to grow inexorably as the music progressed. The certainty that is established after the confused no man's land of the Scherzo was not merely consolidated, but transformed into something spiritual, lifting the whole symphony far above the tangible world. Earlier, Temirkanov's Soviet compatriot, the pianist Eliso Virsaladze, gave a performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto that was always admriably solid, and when required poetic. She produces an unusually rich and powerful cantabile, and on this occasion Temirkanov shaped the accompaniment carefully. But nothing I heard here made me sit up with surprise at Beethoven's daring; rather every revolutionary gesture had been ironed smooth. That feeling happily did not pervade Berlioz's overutre Le Corsaire which the orchestra played with all the outrageous enthusiasm that the music, the product of another marvellously individual mind, deserved. Once more the orchestra was on its mettle, and if in the Beethoven the sound of the oboes and clarinets was on the raw side, here it seemed perfectly in place.

Gregory Rose

The behaviour of the live with the electronic tape and control deck will always be one of the most provocative and immediately engaging aspects of electro-acoustic music, as the third of four Sunday afternoon concerts organized by the Electro-Acoustic Music Association of Great Britain showed grippingly.

Gregory Rose's first "solo" spot, David Evan Jones's Pastoral, was cunningly preceded by the chill resonances of David Wessel's Antony, realized with a digital oscillator bank in 1977 at IRCAM. Sound, still intensified, as the live voice and to its own live transformations (Stephen Montague at the controls). Words, stuttered from verse and cau; ht in the cross-fire of their own sibilants and glottal ricochets, were integrated into their ow, and other echoes, setting un a counterpoint of sonic and imotive relationships.

The instant allusive power of the word and its effect on the "orchestration" of percussive sound from throat, gong and metal strip, reached greater sophistication in Tom Endrich's Savari I. Mr Rose's voice had only controlled amplification here to fill out his virtuosic patterning of phonetics and words, structured through the hythmic techniques of the Indian tal.

This was by far the richest work of the afternoon. The rest of the time was filled with Simon Wates's Dangerous Liaisons, a compact, disruptive tape-abstract of juddering and splintering sound, of metallic and liquid resonances, and with Charles Amirkhanian's just, a dated and unnecessary West Coast taped solo sound-text, all rainbows, bandits and bombs.

Craig Sheppard Queen Elizabeth Hall

Some very fine pianists have come second in the Leeds International Piano Competition, but I am not convinced that Craig Sheppard is one of them.

He has an enviable ease and fluency at the keyboard, and a rare command of colour: at the end of Sunday night's recital, "Le Gibet" in Gaspard de la nuit was touched in with an cerie sense that the central pedal note was being continually sustained, like an open violin string gently stroked while chords shift around it. In terms Attentity explored.

Attention of colour there was much to human action and reaction was admire, too, in Scriabin's Three Etudes Op 65, with each of their conclusions whisked off into > thin air, and in Schumann's simo seemed wilful. Musical points flashed past unmade as a capricious quest for effect dominated the playing perhaps the fortsetzung of the final piece should sound improvisatory, but as murmured by Sheppard it threatened to peter out altogether. Sheppard commendably (one would hope it might be a more widespread practice) offered a new work: Peter Feuchtwanger's Raga Todl. This is the fifth of the composer's studies in an eastern idiom, and consisted of five minutes' happy chirruping around an Indian raga, varied in the long treble solos while the bass held a chord within whose harmonics the treble could resound: in the final moments. both hands joined in a sucdenly Western toccata.

Sixty-one years ago John Reith, an unemployed Scottish engin-eer, applied for and got the general managership of the general managership of the British Broadcasting Company. He recognized that, small as it was, a new power resided therein and that he could have the use of it. Not everyone was so farseeing and, by the time others had caught on, the reins were tight in his huge grasp. His wartime experiences had affected him greatly and Roger Milner, who wrote Reith, which began on BBC1 last night and will conclude tonight, obviously believes – for the first part was studded with wartime flashbacks - that his own world war never finished. Indeed Reith got his first taste of unquestioned power as Transport Officer of the Scottish Rifles, and said that title pleased him more than any of the many he subsequently received because it gave him such power.

At the BBC he strove to combine ethics, as he saw them, with science, carrying out a mission for the Lord. As he emerged last night he merited Churchill's remark about Cripps - "There but for the grace of God goes God" - for his Christianity was of the kind in which righteousness, or maybe self-righteousness, was more easily discernible than

In the BBC panthcon no one matches Reith. His ghost is said to glimmer still, though, over the years, it will have lost some wattage. In contemporary society a man wielding his conscience like a claymore would probably have a short nnings. Reith wielded his last night on family, friends, staff, board and government, build-ing up his infant company into a corporation, rousing Churchill at the General Strike when the latter sought to put radio in the government's scabbard, amending Baldwin's message to the nation for him and demanding the resignation of his able chief engineer, Peter Eckersley, because he was getting divorced.

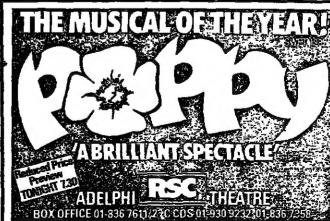

It was tremendous stuff. As Reith, Tom Fleming, possibly best known as a hushed voice on regal occasions, naturally towered - and roared - above all. At 6ft 5in he is an inch shorter than his subject was, but he lacked nothing in meeting

Roger Milner, who tunnelled through the mountain of Reithian lore as well as the four and a half million words of his diary, has also done a magnificient job. The supporting cast have to dart from the shadows for the power of Reith even obscures the BBC, but Peter Barkworth (Baldwin), Robert Lang (Churchill) and Malcolm Stoddard (Eckersley) darted well.

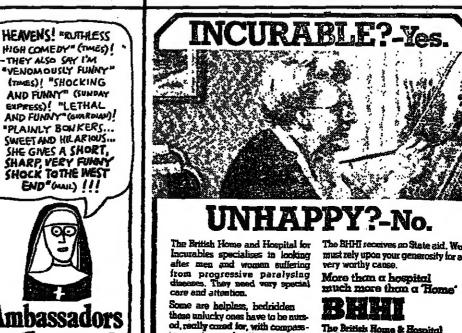

The director of this epic is Kenneth Ives; the producer, Innes Lloyd. Tonight's 90 minutes will no doubt pass as quickly as last night's. One hopes the BBC will be spared a thunderbolt

Victory in 'defeat' on cruise

"The trouble with the West," a senior member of the US administration remarked to one of his colleagues a few days ago, "is that For the women of Greenham Common and their comrades throughout Europe, the grey shapes of giant US transport aircraft glimpsed through the boundary wire as they unloaded the cruise missiles on British soil yesterday - their arrival announced by the Defence Secretary, Michael Heseltine, in the Commons yesterday – will represent a personal defeat and a lethal political disaster. To the politicians and officials involved in Nato's 'two-track" decision, however, it is something close to a triumph. The most contentious alliance programme for a generation - the one the Soviet Union has fought hardest ie overturn in that time - is reaching fruition on schedule and in an atmosphere of battered but resolute

From that perspective the dis-pending deployment in the stern Europe of 41 Pershing 2 and cruise missiles is a Soviet, not western, foreign policy disaster. For Nato, the argument runs, the failure of the Geneva negotiations makes little difference. The Soviets have de-ployed more SS-20s throughout the talks; and the best deal even faintly in prospect at Geneva would still leave the Soviets with perhaps 80 SS-20s trained on Europe (not to mention sizeable numbers of their strategic missiles).

For the Soviet Union, by contrast, the failure looming at Geneva brings the prospect of Pershing 2 and cruise missiles which more imaginative negotiating tactics could have averted altogether. For Moscow, in other words, the difference between success and failure at Geneva will be one of kind rather than degree Moreover, as the Soviet military stumble towards their threatened response of deploying yet more missiles in Eastern Europe, Moscow is hitting all the alliance problems that Nato has contrived to handle. Despite intense pressure, only East Germany and Czechoslovakia have finally agreed to take the new missiles. Hungary is resisting. Bulgaria is ambivalent. And the Rumanian President Ceausescu is publicly trying to carve an independent policy. Western European governments have already paid the

The Soviets would never, in practice, bring their SS-20s down to anywhere hear 140. because any programme of reductions would soon be intermed by the rising tide of furtile South deployments to match British and French efforts. So the Andropov offer turns out to be a sort of arithmetical sleight-of-hand.

But it was the offer's lack of impact in Western Europe which weighed most with the Nato officials in Rome. Given that, does Western European opinion still expect its, governments to make one last effort

This potion has received support in Bonit - Chancellor Kohl has given it muted public blessing - and at the SCG it attracted some kind-words. But critics pointed to two words. But critics pointed to two defects: First, 600 warheads is far too high, so high, as to make a nonsense of any notion of arms control. And the half-smit-half split proposed for the Soviets western and eastern entillements gives Moscow too free a ride in the Far East, which would alarm Japan.

The power of the United Nations is a power not of coercion but of influence, and the influence is steadily diclining. would be sensible to help him.

For such states, law is a facade, and diplomacy (to parody Clausewitz) wer by other means. Such states could not rule by law; for to accept the rule of law is to limit your power, by placing in the hand of the ordinary citizen the only thing that can protect him from dictatorship. Of course these states prefend to rule by law. But in any real conflict with the individual the law is brushed exide, usually by a judge acting under instructions from the dictatorship. Law becomes an exercise in propaganda, but when real interests are threatened, either at home or abroad, it is at once replaced by force as the only principle of political movement.

A state that is not governed by law in its dealings with its own subjects cannot be governed by law in its dealings with other states. In the last analysis, it is only public opinion at home that can compel a government to abide by the precepts of international law and, where this opinion is silenced, the compulsion is no longer felt. The United States is subject to the power of public opinion, spontaneously generated by its domestic rule of law. Its principal enemy - the Soviet Union - is not ruled by law, but by force, without legal opposition, and without the public opinion that would compel it to obey international legislation. Soviet policy towards the United States is inimical, based on ideological aversion, and on a domestic need for the "objective enemy", through whom to justify the privations suffered by the Soviet people. Cuba has its own reasons for natred of the United States. But it is no more bound by the constraint of law than is its ally, and no more susceptible than is its ally to the correcting pressures of legal oppo-sition and public opinion.

To imagine that you can always deal with such states through the medium of law is to give way to a dangerous fantasy. Law is not an independent influence on their behaviour. There is not, within the structure of their domestic government, the responsiveness to law which would enable them to respond also to the law of nations. In any crucial encounter they cast all such moeties aside; and we must, when dealing with them, be prepared to do likewise, or else weaken our defences to the point of

We all wish for that "perpetual peace", in which conflict between nations is resolved by law, and never by force. But, when the most aggressive nations cannot respond to law we must - if we are to achieve the precarious peace which is alone achievable - confront them at the deeper level of genuine enmity. We Europeans, who created the idea of international law, are disposed to believe that the world can be governed by a mere idea. We thereby fall victim to our perennial illusion, which is to believe that the principles whereby we live apply beyond the boundaries of civilization which created them.

you should have heard some of the statements that have been flying around in the last few days. If we are to believe the Dairy Trade Federation, for example, the whole future of doorstep deliveries is in jeopardy, thousands of jobs in the industry are threatened, and the housebound, the sick, the elderly and the handicapped may be deprived of regular visits from their very good friend; the milkman. The agribusiness is normally a notably friendly and hospitable one.

But at a Federation press conference last Thursday, wretched hacks who dared to suggest that, if cut price UHT milk was going to prove all that popular, the British industry might try producing and selling it itself instead of leaving it to the French and the Irish, were brusquely told that they did not know what they were talking about. One official was heard to mutter something about having supposed we were all

The decision by Mr Michael Jopling, Mr Walker's successor, to include sterifized milk, which represents about 6 per cent of the market, and in some parts of Britain as much as 10 per cent, is an altogether different and graver issue.

The Federation claims that milking parlours and creameries in other European countries do not match Britain's strict hygiene standards. Ars longa, Booker brevis

I think we had better straighten out our ideas about literature, publi-cation, book prizes and book promotion. There has of late been much high-minded comment about such enterprises as the "12 Best Post-War Novels" and the Booker prize; Mr Christopher Booker (no relation) was speaking, or perhaps sniffing, for such views a few days ago when he wrote that:

The publishing and bookselling trade has never been so geared to producing vast quantities of glossily packaged, frenetically publicized books, the great majority of which ... are little more than rubbish... Most of those engaged in "the book business" have been swept up into a self-delading characte-which has... little to do with the real merits of literature . . . At the same time Mr Nicholas de Jongh, taking a welcome break from his normal weekly announcement that the Royal Shakespeare Company is about to close down for lack of funds, devoted himself to a theme nowadays heard at least as frequently as Mr Booker's; he declared that the Arts Council's Literature Department, Marghanita Laski up, has failed the nation and must go, adducing as his evidence that:

There could be no more damning testimony to the literature depart-ment's creative bankruptcy thanthe fact that for the last two financial years...the depart-ment failed to spend a considerable portion of its grant allocation... In the last two years it has focused attention on the encouragement of readers rather than

On the face of it, the argument espoused by the high-minded Booker (who writes on vellum in an unheated monk's cell with a signed photograph of Aristotle on the wall before him) is the very opposite of that put forward by the low-minded de Jongh (who writes at Langan's Brasserie on a word-processor lightly sprinkled with Beaujolais Nouveau). The one is appalled at the publication and boosting of "non-books by non-authors"; the other is these critics of the present state of affairs are trapped in the same fallacy. They assume that literature is a plant as frail and endangered as the darling buds of May and that it can flourish only if the right conditions - more money in de Jongh's view, less vulgarity in Booker's - are prescht; they also believe that whatever the right conditions are they can be brought into being by the actions of the right

To be sure, that is a somewhat extreme form of missing the point, but in principle the writer was doing the same as Messrs Booker and de Jongh (and for that matter Fay Weldon, whose speech at the Booker Prize award dinner managed to combine both of their approaches). MAN IN THE IRON MASK

Soviet officials are assuring improve the corrupt, inefficient Western journalists that President Andropov will soon reappear in public. After more than three months' absence, however, it is questionable whether he can establish his control over the Politburo on his return, since his health as he approaches seventy will remain in doubt. He has not succeeded in replenishing the leadership with his own men, and even inose who, like Geidar Aliev and Grigory Romanov, were pro-moted after the death of Mr Brezhnev, are unlikely to pin their career to a man who appears to have little future.

Not only did Mr Andropov make history by failing to take the salute along with the other leaders on the anniversary of the 1917 Bolshevik seizure of power; even more significantly, he did not receive the normal tributes of a personal nature in the speeches of the other Politburo members in the days which followed. On the contrary, last Thursday Pravda carried an editorial honouring Mr Brezhnev, praising his contribution to the economic and social development of the USSR, and to the relaxation of international tensions. President Andropov emerged as merely continuing established party policy, despite his well publicized efforts to

This might suggest that Kon-stantin Chernenko, seen as Leonid Brezhnev's choice and a rival to Mr Andropov for the post of General Secretary, is making a come-back as the central figure in a replacement leadership. Yet he is now 72; having been passed over before, and having since lost important responsibilities, he seems no more likey than other possible stop-gaps such as Viktor Grishin, who is three years younger and the leader of the Moscow party organization.

Mr Chernenko does have the considerable advantage of seven years' experience in the other top party body, the Secretariat. Of the other nine full members of the Politburo (excluding Mr Andropov) only Mikhail Gorbachev, 52, and Grigory Romanov, 60, are in both top groups, which gives them a distinct advantage over Geidar Aliev, also 60, who came from Azerbaidzhan to Moscow in November last year as a first deputy premier.

Of course so little is known about the personalities and real policy preferences of possible successors that the attention this question receives in the West greatly exceeds its value. Mr Romanov presided over a considerable rise in industrial production as party boss in Lenigrad for more than a decade. He has visited France, Italy and Norway and been on delegations to China, Cuba Vietnam and other communist countries. Mikhail Gorbachev has visited France. West Germany, Belgium and Canada, where earlier this year he headed a Soviet delegation and made some impact with his comments on East-West relations. He has experience of directing both agriculture and industry. Yet Mr Andropov's career was largely that of a faceless bureaucrat operating in a most unpleasant system. He became General Secretary without showing any interest in travelling to the West and without much experience of economic management either.

Perhaps most significant is the impression of a moribund political system which arises from contemplating the elderly, uninspiring leaders standing on the mausoleum of the dead Lenin. from whom they claim their legitimacy. Even in the absence of the General Secretary, party control over the whole country grinds on, supported by those whose career depends on it, and suffered in passive acceptance by most others. Change for the better in domestic and foreign policy seems as unlikely as the sudden emergence in the near future of a dynamic new leader-

CALLING ON THE CARDINAL

Priests and ministers of religion, acting under conscience, that his Christian duty oliges may feel obliged to take positions against the policies and actions of the reigning power. Thomas à Becket and Thomas More both did so and paid with their lives. The Reverend Dick Sheppard, in our own time, took a stand for unqualified pacifism against the opinion of the state and the majority of the public. Yet he was everywhere respected for it, not simply because ours is a more tolerant century, but because he was understood to be acting in obedience to an absolute religious principle which transcended the interest of rival states, and political creeds. That, however, is not how the majority of his Roman Catholic co-religionists are likely to see the action of Mgr Bruce Kent, his CND role with this kind of the general secretary of CND, in political activity he affronts the addressing the Communist Party eckena, and doing so (as he put it) not simply as a duty but as a pleasure. He declared the Communist Party and CND may have to accept him as a to be "partners in the cause of ministering priest. Earlier this peace" and exposed something year, Cardinal Hume warned of his own attitude of mind by Mgr Kent that if CND became of his own attitude of mind by praising the Morning Star for its more "political" it might be steady, honest and generous coverage of the whole disarmament case."

Mgr Kent is entitled to believe him to advocate unilateral nuclear disarmament and to accept in his campaign the help of who agrees with him on the question. But that is quite different from proclaiming close partnership with a political party which uses the nuclear arms campaign to promote international policies generally believed to be to the advantage of the country most dangerous to the West, and most systematically inimicable to Christianity

That Mgr Kent takes his position in good faith is beside the point. The question is whether, by closely identifying his CND role with this kind of good faith of the larger number believe that their Christian duty leads them to his position, but inappropriate for a priest to be so closely associated with it, and that he might have to stand down. For the time being however, Mgr Kent was not confronted with a hard choice between his religious calling and his CND cause since the Cardi-Communists and anyone else nal recognized the supreme importance of the nuclear arms question for any Christian.

> In the summer, the papal Pro-Nuncio, Mgr Bruno Heim, caused some distress among Catholics by suggesting that Mgr Kent might be serving Soviet interests. Yet is was a suggestion hardly discredited by Mgr Kent's own reported observation, in an interview in the Morning Star on May 25, that historically it is the West that has made the running in the arms race, with the East constantly trying to catch up, and making the most constructive disarmament proposals. That seems to touch more upon political opinion than the conse quences of faith and doctrine. Mgr Kent's weekend rhetoric to his Communist audience formalises his position. Cardinal Hume was undoubtedly right to give Mgr Kent a second chance in April. He would not be wrong now, in the interests of the wider Communion, if he decided to change his mind.

CARVE-UP AT REUTERS

a news agency, collecting and disseminating the raw material of much of what appears in newspapers and is heard on broadcasting services the world over. It is the most famous, if not always and in all respects the best, agency of its kind. A related activity, which has always been its most profitable, is less widely known. This is the provision of intelligence for and about financial markets. Paul Julius (later Baron de) Reuter was into that from the word go in 1851. He would have approved the nature as well as the profits of the electronic business information services that the company has developed in the past ten years with such spectacular results.

Success has brought its problems. The financial services side of the business is now so dominant and potentially expansive as to threaten to eclipse and possibly to distort the general news gathering operation. And now the owners, who are the newspapers of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand through the medium of their trade associations or cooperatives, four in number, see a billion pounds or more locked up in this most valuable asset and would like to release it by means of a public flotation.

Reuters has been through several types of ownership in the course of its history. Each change is accompanied by public heartsearching, for already early in the century Reuters had become a national institution exciting protective feelings. The last najor change of ownership was in 1941. The war had truncated the agency's operations and revenues. It was then wholly owned by the Press Association. a cooperative of provincial newspapers. The Newspaper Proprietors Association, representative of the national newsrapers, offered to secure the gency by purchasing half the Chief Justice. shares for £170,000 (its holding ... is now put at £400m.).

Reuters is known to the public as said the source of news should be pure and undefiled, a description he witheld from Fleet Street's press barons. Other speakers expressed similar concern at the press lords getting their hands on Reuters. A BBC-like arrangement was proposed. Brendan Bracken, the Minister for information, went in to bat for the barons. But he owned that there was public concern. He and the Chancellor of the Exchequer were talking to the parties and would say to them, "It is desirable on the whole that you should have some form of trusteeship".

Six days later the trust arrangement was announced. A declaration of trust signed by the PA and NPA set forth the principles of the new ownership, which is regarded as in the nature of a trust rather than as an investment". The most important principles were that Reuters should at no time pass into the hands of any one interest, group or faction; and that the agency's integrity, independence and freedom from bias should be preserved. Moreover the trust was to be irrevocable for 21 years. Thereafter it could be dissolved only if in the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice its objects could not continue to be secured by the form of the trust in the then existing circumstances. Enter surprisingly the Lord Chief Justice. It looked good. It was meant to look good. Is it good? Reuters' legal advisers tell them that the trust is not a trust in law but a shareholders' agreement and therefore terminable by the unanimous decision of the four shareholders without reference to any third party. So much for the pieties about trust before investment, easier to observe of a loss-making than a fortunemaking responsibility; and so much for the protective machinery. Exit surprisingly the Lord distinct from the board, said they will seek independent legal advice if a scheme of capital reconstruction is put to them. Trust law is a difficult area. It is indeed important that the status of the Reuters trust and the legal obligations of the board (not to mention the role of the Lord Chief Justice) should be clarified before things are taken much further.

The first guarantee of the objectivity and accuracy of the Reuters news service lies in the professionalism of directors and staff. The second guarantee is the fact that a biased, prejudiced or propagandist news agency would not have enough takers of its tapes in the free world to be a commercial proposition. Here at least the tendency of the market is to purify. But the existence of these practical defences does not make unneccessary or merely ornamental the sort of guarantees that the Reuters trust sought to offer. That is especially the case when the present danger is that Reuters as a news agency may be neglected or even smothered by Reuters as a hugely profitable provider of financial services.

Two objects are to be achieved. One is to secure out of the profits of the market intelligence side of the business the financial future and sufficiency of development capital for the news agency side of the business. The second object is to ensure that there remains a sufficient (and sufficiently spread) newspaper interest in the control of the company to prevent the neglect or distortion of that part of its activities.

Several devices have been employed elsewhere with that sort of object in view: two classes of share, voting and non-voting, veto powers of a specified kind built into founders' shares; or and this is perhaps the most promising avenue - a division of the shares with most of them being floated or sold on the stock exchange, but 30 per cent sav retained, with veto powers, by the four press bodies through which newspaper interests now participate in Reuters.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Business costs

and confidence From Mr Martin G. Wassell

Sir, On my return from abroad today, I have just seen your excellent leader (November 8) on the gloommorgers of the CBL You do not, however, have to worry that the rest of the world cannot be expected to know of those increasingly healthy aspects of the British economy which you enumerate simply be-cause some of our own humanium at Glasgow appeared not to have noticed them.

Judging from my own not inconsiderable contact with foreign businessmen, the latter not only have a good grasp of the facts you mention but (particularly the Euro-pean businessmen) willingly admit to envy. What commentators in the UK sceptically refer to as "the Thatcher experiment" is widely admired by foreign businessmen as an exercise in sound policy-making which is slowly but surely reversing this country's long-term economic decline, I even had Pitt the Younger quoted at me recently by a Dutch businessman: "England has saved herself by her exertions, and will, as I trust, save Europe by her example"!

incidentally, there is one import-ant point in the context of your leader which you did not raise. Why for the past couple of decades or so has British management, on average, failed so dramatically to protect profit margins in industry? The CBI frequently draws attention to the severity of the slump in rates of return and the profit share in the UK compared with virtually every other advanced industrial nation. The implication of that undeniable fact, however, is that British management has (until very recently) been bad at controlling its costs – most notably wage costs per unit of output.

Moreover, if, as is likely, a principal reason for management's poor performance in this respect is that it has had to contend with Britain's peculiarly lawless system of industrial relations, why has the CBI not been more resolute in supporting this Government's efforts to place our trade unions within a framework of law more comparable to that of other industrial countries?

The CBI continues to campaign hard for the Government to alleviate the burden on business of such costs as rates and the national insurance surcharge; and it is easy to agree that a main aim of policy should be to improve substantially the profitability of industry. But, given the track record of British management as a whole, how can any government feel really confident that the reliefs it may provide will translate into higher profits and investment rather than into higher pay settlements?

or generous a government may be towards business, it cannot raise corporate profitability if management cannot maintain a firm grip on the costs within its own control. The CBI is at its most valuable when it is reminding its members of that.

Yours faithfully, MARTIN G. WASSELL, The Institute of Economic Affairs, Lord North Street, Westminster, SW1. November 11.

Gift of tongues

From Miss Jane Gilbert Sir, Tony Bell suggests (November 2) "a national plan to ensure a decent level of expertise in all the major foreign languages".

It would certainly be a good aim to raise the general level of language expertise in this country. But what about those who specialise in language skills, only to find them-selves forced to work abroad as there are so few openings for translators or interpreters here in Britain?

There are at present four postgraduate courses in this country preparing language graduates for work in this field (at the universities of Bath. Bradford and Kent. and the Polytechnic of Central London). Most of those who complete the courses and who do not choose to work abroad either remain unemployed, adapt their skills or accept work unrelated to their studies.

It's about time professional linguists were given a proper chance to make a contribution at home. Yours sincerely. GILBERT.

Lessons of Grenada From Professor David Lowenthal

Sir, Events in Grenada reopen the case for a West Indian federation.
Self-government is a legitimate source of self-respect in Caribbean mini-states, as it is in the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands; but formal sovereignty alone cannot quell thuggery or piracy, of which Grenada has been by no means the region's only target.
The origins of Grenadian sovereignty throw light on this issue. The British West Indies were projected to attain independence in a federation that came into being in 1958. That federation broke up in rancour in 1962, intensifying insular ani-mosity and mistrust. After Jamaica, Trinidad, Guyana and Barbados became independent no theoretical justification remained to deny selfgovernment to the smaller eastern Caribbean territories.

Territorial size had become urelevant to the attainment of nationhood; a Grenadian minister echoed a UN resolution that "inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence". Most of the islands became associated states, naught, not only because memories

The human needs of social justice From Mr Henry Parris

Sir, Professor von Hayek states (feature, November 11) that he has "no idea what 'social market economy' can possibly mean". It is a strange confession from an economist and Nobel laureate. But since he appears to seek enlightenment, it would be churlish not to respond.

A social market economy is one which supplies those needs of individuals which the market fails to provide. In some cases, the deficiencies are on the demand side. For example, the income of the old is usually inadequate because they no longer have labour to sell. The mentally handicapped are not only unable to sell their labour, but cannot use money to buy clothing food and shelter even if they have

In other cases the weakness is on the supply side. Many producers bring goods and services to the market which are in excess of the effective demand, Pharmaceutical companies and professors of economics are cases in point. The state intervenes to raise the demand

In other cases the costs of providing a service - environmental health, for example - may be difficult to bring home to those who enjoy the benefits. So they are met out of taxation instead of being charged to individual customers. If, as I think, defence, law and order should be viewed in the same economic light, an additional argument applies. They require the use of force, so if entrepreneurs come forward to provide such services, the state should refuse to contract them out for reasons which the news from Lebenon daily makes clear.

Admittedly, the terminology is confusing, and if Professor Hayek wishes to change it, he has my support. But the underlying concepts are clear and built into the fabric of every civilised state,

From Sir Desmond Lee

Why not abbreviate the offending phrase simply to "the economy" and acknowledge that it has a non-market as well as a market side? Yours faithfully, HENRY PARRIS White Lodge, 15 Murdoch Road, Wokingham, Berkshire, November 12,

From Mr Edgar Palamountain Sir, Few things need saying more often than those so eloquently expressed by Professor von Hayek (November 11).

On the central theme of "social justice", however, he could have invoked the authority of a more eminent critic than Charles Curran. I feel sure Sir Charles would happily defer to T. S. Eliot, who wrote that the term "should never be employed unless the user is prepared to define clearly what social justice means to him and why he thinks it is just".

To me only a subjective definition seems possible. Social justice is the pattern of relative material rewards favoured by the user of the term and his friends.

Yours faithfully, EDGAR PALAMOUNTAIN. Duns Tew Manor, Oxford. November 11.

From Mr Jack Hendy Sir, Professor F. A. Hayek seems obliged to make use of an unconscionable number of words in order to paraphrase the simple question that Cain once asked of God: "Am I my brother's keeper?". Yours faithfully,

Crown Agents

SCTVC.

From Sir Bernard Braine, MP for Castle Point (Conservative) Sir, The withdrawal of the Brunei investment funds from the Crown Agents in July has led to considerable anxiety in the organization at all levels.

Having watched the work of the Crown Agents over the last 35 years, I consider they have served their. overseas clients and Britain well. It. cannot be in anyone's interest that this unique purchasing organization. which has such a high reputation for impartiality and integrity, with over 100 governments and 300 public authorities as well as multinational aid agencies, should be undermined in any way.

Their value to British industry, particularly smaller firms, is also of crucial importance at the present

We must surely hope that such key factors will not be lost in the Government's consideration of the future of the Crown Agents. Yours faithfully, BERNARD BRAINE. House of Comments. November 9.

in its approach to the art and craft of medicine and the effect on these of the latest new things to come out of the laboratories sustained by the Medical Research Council or of the pharmaceutical industry. The discovery of the sulphonamides in 1935 and the long delayed fruition in the early 1940s of the penicillin discovered by Sir Alexander Fleming in 1929 introduced a new era in the practice of medicine.

The Practitioner could no longer be looked on as a part-time occupation for distinguished doctors with literary tastes. Thomson was becoming and became a professional journalist, following a tradition long hallowed in the wider world of daily journalism in which the great figures began as techniques of tapping the treasures of the English lanpuage for the benefit of the hurried reader communing daily from home to office and back

The Practitioner could have made no better choice when it appointed Thomson as its fulltime editor. His varied career could so easily have led him, via research, to the whole-time staff of a teaching hospital. He brought to his editorial task - and to his work for The Times cise Medical Dictionary in 1977. and The Daily Telegraph - a rich experience of medicine, an exact and exacting training, and in mind capable of concentrat-ing on the task in hand to the exclusion of everything that was not relevant to it. His capacity for unremitting hard work was immense. He was no respecter of persons. His Pantheon was thinly inhabited. In it there were two men who influenced him in particular - the late Sir Heneago Ogilvie, who for some time helped him to edit The Practitioner, and Sir William Haiey under whom he worked

She also appeared as Peter Pan on tour; n a West End musical version of a Sheridan comedy, and at the Edinburgh Festival in two seasons of an elaborate Scottish diversion "Highland Fair" (1952 and 1953) at the Assembly Hall. Born at Saltburn-by-the-Sea in Yorkshire, she studied at the Royal College of Music. She made her debut in Eldorado at the old Daly's Theatre in 1930, but later she was occupied for some time in the spectacular White Horse Inn when much of the Tyrol (with mountains, a lake, and a good deal else) seemed to arrive at the Coli-seum. In London (1931) she played the bride; next year she had the leading part, Josepha, on tout.

In 1933 she was touring in The Gay Hussar, and in December, 1934, had her first important part in pantomime,

That autumn, at the Embassy and Kingsway, she was the maid Lucy in a short run of the musical Rivals! Sheridan's play (the exclamation mark indicated its change from straight comedy). She went on to Jack & the Beanstalk pantomine at the King's, Hammersmith, returning as Robinson Crusoe the following Christmas. Between these engagements she had an opera season at Covent Garden playing for example Kate Pinkerton in Madam Butterfly. During 1937 she toured as Sari in Coward's Bitter Sweet: and in later years, in various parts of the country, she played a sequence of Principal Boys for which she had the right style, aspect and voice. Apart from pantomine, she toured in 1943 as Peter Pan; in London was in the 1944 revival of The Lilar Domino; and toured also The Merry Widow and The Dancing Years.

She married Dr Raymont Williams in 1939; the marriage was later dissolved.

microcomputer markets in France and West Germany compared with Britain is shown up dramatically by the Economist Intelligence Unit's latest research reports.

The total value of all micros sold in Britzin – home computers, personal computers and workstations -. is running well ahead of the rest of Europe. The UK aggregate for 1982 was £263m, compared with DM645m (£181m) in West and FF1,383m

In mit sales Britain is much forther ahead. The number of micros sold in the UK last year was almost twice that in Germany and France combined. Britain's head start in home computers is responsible for our overall lead. UK sales in this sector which the EIU defines as micros costing less than £500, were worth £94m in 1982 compared with £28m German and £13m French sales. In the middle sector of the market (personal computers priced between £500 and £3,000) Britaia was only just chead of Germany (£109m v £92m). And in the top range (workstations costing £3,000 to £10,000) the two countries were about level, with £60m sales in

Sir Clive Sinclair must take most credit for the UK lead. But the ER, points to another factor: The virtual absence of powerful national multiple chains in Germany (such as Smiths, Boots or Dixons in the United Kingdom) explains why the German home computer market has lagged behind the United Kingdom to date."

Lack of support from government

France also has a weak distribution structure. Home computers are sold there mainly through specialist micro shops cach last year; but France is and several brands have had to again in third place at £31m.

Chinese on a keyboard

China is hoping to make national use of micro-computers for automatic processing of Chinese character infor-mation within three years, Such systems are used in enterprises covering transportation, com-modities, fireight forwarding, financial statistics, information retrieval and many other fields.

According to Qian Weichang, president of the Chinese Information Processing Society of China, China's research into this field is "ripening". He says: "Many Chinese designed information processing systems are now in serial production and even more are ready for production. Colour pictures and Chinese character computers have already been developed.

"Some subjects need about 30,000 characters and the information of phrases and grammar are, therefore, complicated, making it difficult to develop computers to process information in Chinese charac-

Now Commodore moves

Keen watchers of Commodore's marketing machinations will find the latest moves by this highly successful company interesting. They have carried the price-war reported in these columns a stage further, indeed to its logical conclusion. They are now giving the software

There are precedents to this; the ill-fated Osborne company, (now going through the traumas of American bankruptcy proccedings), gave away a lot of software with their portable machine.

Commodore's new moves are twofold. Firstly they are giving away the Easyscript wordprocessing package which suns on the Commodore 64, together with a disk containing games, to any buyer of the 1541 Disk drive. This represents a discount of £105 off the normal £225 price at which the drive was recently selling.

Secondly, they are "bundling" the word-processing package Superscript, and the new powerful database Superbase free with a purchase of a system. This means you must buy a computer, a disk drive and a printer, worth about £2,700 to qualify. The software would otherwise have been complete Commodore 700 sold, at £900, so the discount must represent about 33 per cent.
The implications for the user are quite clear, more for less; the significance for the market is more opaque.

At first sight, this looks like another shrewd marketing ploy.

MARKETING Commodore's marketing approach is said to be: "We price according to what the market will bear", so the implication is that the competition is causing this move, i.e. the market will not bear quite so much. Another possibility is that the new 700 machine is not selling as well as hoped. It is worth noting the swing of emphasis away from the 700 machine in Commodore's recent advertis-

DAVID HEWSON gives the home user's view on Page 16

Perhaps Commodore feel that too much money is being producers, and they want a large slice for themselves.

Precision Software, who produced these packages, no doubt stand to gain a lot from the contract signed on November 3, but what about the long term view?

Up to now, a main attraction of the Commodore line has been the support of many independent software houses. whose products have helped keep sales of the machines high, despite the fact that the designs are not at the very edge of the

The vast sale of the .64 machine - more than three quarters of a million world-wide has created a very great potential market, which the software producers have found

However, now they face the possibility that Commodore will cut the ground from beneath their feet, by destroying a large part of their potential market, without warning. Will the producers continue to develop software in these circumstances? Even if they hope that their product will be the one chosen by Commodore as the free give-away, they may fear that their negotiating strength is minimal, when it comes to talking about prices.

Many producers may feel inclined to desert the Commodore range, and aim at some other place where large fature markets may be expected. The fascinating question is, how will Commodore get on if the software producers, stung by price reductions, and this latest manoeuvre, decide to desert?

It seems possible that enterprising entrepreneurs may buy the bundle here, and include in a little international arbitrage by unbundling the bits and selling them sepately on the Continent Are the markets really that separate? It will be very interesting to see whether sales soar as a result of all this, or whether the golden goose is due for an obituary notice.

City of London Based

£16,000 -- £22,000 + car

Our client is the management consulting wing of one of the world's major accounting firms, a company maintaining a world-wide banking practice as varied as it is widespread and internationally regarded as among the leaders in the provision of extensive services to bankers across the world, particularly where related to computerised systems.

Following growing demand for their services in the banking sector, they now wish to appoint several computer systems professionals at various levels to augment their highly experienced City-based team, currently undertaking top-level assignments for a large number of both U.K. and foreign banks. Activities are diverse ranging from strategic consulting through to systems design and project management, using some of the most advanced technology available. Applications include retail banking, funds transfer systems, foreign exchange and money markets, office automation and management information systems.

Aged 27-35, with a degree or relevant professional qualification, you will have had at least 5 years successful and progressive data processing experience, a substantial proportion of which will have been spent on banking applications — management experience is desirable for senior positions. Excellent verbal and written skills are essential, as are the personal qualities necessary to advise senior client management.

The company offers exceptional scope for consultants of the requisite calibre — promotion and salary progression is rapid and opportunities will arise to work overseas if desired. You will be encouraged to develop your own business awareness and technical skill to the peak of your ability, and to take an active part in the growth and development of one of the foremost sional firms in the world.

think, to all. About a year ago, when Commodore, arguably the most successful international home computer company of them all, got around to launching its new 64k machine, it needed a word processing program. This was sensible, since the CBM 64 was a promising and powerful machine which ought to be able to handle reasonably complex small business functions, word processing among them.

Commodore's solution was to handle a version of a program called Wordpro which ran on its larger machines. Called Easyscript, it was a standard business word proces-sing program, or to put it another way, it was definitely not easy to use.

The 64 version does not allow the writer to change his text in the format in which it is printed. Paragraphs and printing instructions such as under-lining need to be imbedded in the text with two character symbols which bear no phonetic esemblance to their function.

The problem of reconciling the home screen of 40 columns with a wider printed page means that anyone using Easyscript could never tell where the program might split one sentence on to the next page, without making tedious circuits through the system. In short, Easyscript was a standard business program, fine for a professional application in which someone would be trained to use it, but altogether too daunting for the inexperienced home user (and I write as

David Hewson

At the same time that Commodore launched Easyscript, an individual software programmer came up with the idea of writing his own WP system for the 64, one designed to be sufficiently user filendly to make it easy for the home user to learn, but powerful enough to handle small business

Vizawrite, as that program was to be called, came out a few weeks behind Easyscript, and I might as well intow away at pretence of impartiality here and say that I am delighted it

Instead of messing around with meaningless symbols to manipulate the text, Vizawrite possessed some logic. To centre, one pressed the control key and 'c'; to underline, the same key and 'u'. The text was printed across the TV on a rolling screen which could be instantly contracted into 40 columns at a touch to two buttons.

Soon Vizawrite appeared on cartridge, making the program instantly available the momment the computer was switched on, and a 30,000 word dictionary which should also count the length of articles was added. While Easystript relentlessly insisted on using Commo-dore printers or an expensive interface, Vizawrite contained a free link with any of the standard serial printers. Now I know for a fact that there were those within Commodore who were aware that they had been faced with an immensely superior product. I also know their reaction: the company will now offer a free version of Easyscript – the old price was around £75 a copy – with every one of its £230 disk drives.

I am loathe to criticize any company for giving something away to the home user. But is this really to anyone's advan-tage? The new computer owner who gets his free copy of Easyscript will, I suspect, be somewhat disappointed, unless he has previous experience of business programs.

If he ends up thinking that word processing is not worth the bother, will Commodore really stand to gain? And Vizawrite, which is so superior in quality and competitive in price - with the spelling program it came in at less than £100 - stands to be left cut in the cold by the hard sell tactics which it cannot match.

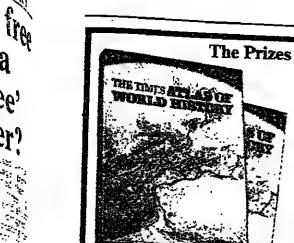

I can only hope that I am wrong when I fear that the best product will suffer because of the machinations of the giants above it,

But in the long run, it is not just the small software companies which suffer when the market turns against its brightest technology; it is the computer business itself.

Halfway through this article. I discovered that I had filled one disk with my home computer musings, effortlessly and with great pleasure, through Vizawrite. Had I been left with no choice but Easyscript, the hardware which printed this column might now have been sitting in the window of a second hand shop.

RANK XEROX

He wanted a typewriter capable of increasing productivity and improving quality.

She wanted a typewriter which was easy to use and meant less wasted time.

They both chose the Xerox Touch.

Choose the Xerox Touch for your office and everyone will be happy.

The secretary gets through her typing in a fraction of the time. The boss knows this makes for a more efficient office. And everyone is impressed with the finished, flawless results.

Yet for anyone who has ever used an ordinary typewriter, the keyboard feels instantly familiar. And all its sophisticated features are just as easy to use.

Take the memory for instance. Routine phrases - even whole documents can be typed once, stored, then reproduced automatically at the touch of a key.

Change your mind and the Xerox electronic typewriter makes selfcorrection simple and quick. Every single page has that professional 'printed look'. And automatic emboldening and underlining make even the longest document easier to read.

All this plus an impressive range of automatic features are common throughout the range. Whilst the most advanced models have text editing, forms filling and 20 character displays so typing can be checked before it is printed.

Whatever your business, the Xerox Touch will always be a popular choice. For more information on the ideal 600 Series Electronic Typewriter for your

SHARP ANNOUNCES THE PORTABLE OFFICE.

It's something the computer world has been striving to achieve for decades. And now Sharp technology has cracked it.

The new Sharp PC 5000

16-bit portable computer. It weighs only 5kg. It travels in a briefcase just 326mm x 305mm. Yet it carries with it all the power of the full-size computer

Because apart from its own exceptional capacity, it allows you to dial in to your own office computer for added information, from any telephone line, anywhere in the world.

Its capacity is, therefore, unlimited. The PC 5000 computer is, quite literally, a portable office.

And because it uses a 'bubble' memory — more robust than floppy disks — you can even use it in transit, on trains, boats and planes. This remarkable machine has liquid crystal display. And is powered by rechargeable 8-hour batteries. An integral printer is also available.

All this, to help stamp out that frustrating phrase 'I'll get back to you.' Words that have lost a million business deals.

People/Tony Kench of GEISCO

Ringing the bell

By Roger Woolnough classics degree may not ound like the starting point for successful career in comput-ig, but Tony Kench has a teory about it. "A classics ducation does leave you with o illusions that what you know of any use to anybody." he ays, "so you have to do things

Although still only 41, Kench as been involved with comuters since the pioneering ays, when practically every-ody was doing things from ratch. Straight from Bristol iniversity (where his second abject was maths), he joined an nglo-French computer com-any called De La Rue Bull fachines in 1963.

Through a complex series of wnership changes, involving oth General Electric of the JSA and Honeywell, part of his firm became General lectric Information Services company (GEISCO), A few ceks ago, Tony Kench was prointed managing director of EISCO's operations in the UK

I started off on the sales ide," he recalls, "but one was a ombined salesman and systems nalyst. You had to explain to o before they would buy it."

Soon after he joined, though, he company started Europe's irst time-sharing operation, in thich a large central computer s used by numerous clients perating from remote ter-ninals. Kench switched to that ide of the business in its heady ays of early growth.

He has mainly stayed with the information services activity ever since, including five years with GEISCO in the US. This culminated in 1979 with a move to the company's strategic planning operation, where he led a group charged with looking into the future,

"I had a strong sense back then that the computer industry was changing in ways which would have major impact on our business", Kench says. "We spent two years working on what should be GEISCO's positioning in the next decade."

The company's international experience was obviously a valuable asset. GEISCO's worldwide teleprocessing net-work allows clients in 750 cities to access computers with a local telephone call. But time-sharing does not play the dominant role it once did.

"As in-house systems became more capable", Kench explains, "as the minicomputer became widespread, as the micro ap-peared on the horizon, it became clear that our role should change and evolve."

Low-tech Sundays at St Paul's

Today GEISCO offers a wide range of systems and consulting services, all aimed at companies which operate across national boundaries. "When you look at how a computer network can help an export business and allow a company to be in constant touch with production schedules, price variations, and so on, there's a real opportunity to turn this into a competitive weapon," he says.

There is nothing competitive or high-tech about the way Kench relaxes. He takes part in the essentially English pastime of bellringing. He is at St Paul's Cathedral on Sundays, and attends a bellringing meeting once a week, but it is not a cotally exempted. totally escapist pastime. Says Kench: "I would think at least half of the bellringers in the City of London are in computing."

Why quality really matters in video games Beware the cheap imitators

The home computer boom has not of the highest quality. As a opened up many opportunities result we have tended to opened up many opportunities for new business to supply both hardware and software. If you believe the hysterical publicity put out by some firms you could be forgiven for thinking that the whole business is run by 16-year-old millionaires. Certainly there are some clever adolescents around who seem to be peculiarly in touch with what home computer users now available for home computers has a much more traditional pedigree. Psion traditional pedigree, Psion Software, the London based microcomputer software firm, is a good example. It has produced several best-sellers for the top-selling Sinclair Spec-trum as well as maintaining more than a passing interest in the wider field of serious business computing on more expensive machines.

"We are interested in becoming the dominant micro soft-ware house in Europe," said Psion's managing director, Psion's managing director, David Potter. In its third year of business, Potter expects a turnover in the region of £6m. and a good part of that will come from Psion's sales of Generally, Psion's products would be described as video games and in many ways they are just that. But Potter is at pains to emphasise that 'simple video games are not the way to build a lasting portfolio of products, "It is a very competitive market so we purposely try not to put out anything that is graphics, coupled with a realistic cockpit display make the experience extremely effective. Potter reckons that as many as a million people have 'flown' in Psion's simulator which raises the knotty problem of software copying, because any poplualr program is bound to be passed round among enthusiast Potter is realistic about this.

"Sure, copying goes on and I don't approve of it. The problem is that the cassette is the cheapest means of distribut-ing software – and it is so easy to copy it. We are only really after large-scale commercia copying and we will crush any attempt to do this."

We see school teachers as the biggest offenders. "They seem to think it is quite moral to copy software. In the long run this is to their detriment. Software companies have to believe that it is worthwhile developing a product and won't go into it if they don't think the are going to get a return on it. This is why the quality of educational software is low - no quality software developer is going to get into the market."
Porter's answer is to keep the

David Potter; sophisticated quality products product cheap and many of that this is not the case and Psion's programs sell for the same sort of price as an LP. "We had a lot of say in the setting of pricing standards because of our close relationship with Sinclair," he said, "The software on the Spectrum is cheaper than any other range - and it is probably the widest range of any home computer."

The comparison with the price of a record and the parallels with the music and publishing business could lead one to think that software production is similar to those industries. Potter is adamant

"People have equated it with pop music and publishing but it really is not like that. I think the film industry is a better comparison - there you have studios and distributors. The studios create a product which may cost millions and then rely on the distributors to recoup

"We are more like the studio with teams of people working on projects. I think publishers program authors.

"I think they have found to their cost that this is not the way to go and have now. revamped their operation to run on the same sort of lines as Psion has a large digital equipment minicomputer and uses sophisticated programming languages and a technique called 'cross' compilation' to generate its programs for the Spectrum and other home micros. It is no surprise; therefore, that Potter and many of his employees have a strong technical background.

No more private investors after the year 2000?

A Stock Exchange survey yesterday confirmed a trend already largely identified: the small investor is getting smaller and the large investor, almost always now an institution, is getting much more

In just under 20 years, the proportion of shares held by private individuals has dropped from ust over half to slightly more than a quarter. Over the same period, the institutions - pension funds, insurance companies, unit and investment trusts - have doubled their share to almost two thirds of the total market.

The value of shares held has not been adjusted for inflation. In nominal terms the total value of shares held by individuals grew from £16 billion in 1975 to £28 billion by the end of 1981. Institutional holdings were worth £57.6 billion, against £21 billion in 1975.

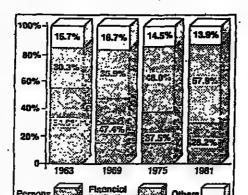

Among the institutions, pension funds have frown faster than the rest. In the six years to 1981, their proportion of the market rose by more than half to 26.7 per cent. The share of insurance companies is up by a quarter to 20.5 per cent.

Direct involvement in the Stock Exchange among small investors has certainly dwindled, but this is hardly surprising as the survey points out the taxation of savings in this country is weighted heavily in favour of institutional saving, notably of course in the treatment

Tax advantages given to indirect investment have naturally encouraged "safety first" attitudes among people who traditionally invested directly in company securities.

By reducing the relative return for risktaking against the "assumed" return, for example, from an insurance policy, the tax system has acted as a spur to forms of saving other than shares.

The survey, the result of painstaking research among 222 British public companies (131 on a census basis), does not include the three-year-old Unlisted Securities Market. There, it seems, small investors carry proportionately much more weight,

The survey comes at a time when the Stock Exchange is making further efforts to persuade the Government to cut taxes on equity investment, especially the 2 per cent stamp duty and the investment income surcharge.

Although the figures are already two years old; the projection is that pension fund and other institutional shareholdings will grow by between 1.5 per cent and 2 per cent a year. At that rate private investors would not exist by the year 2000.

But directly or indirectly, the private appetite for share buying still exists. Whether it grows or diminishes will depend largely on government taxation

Mrs Thatcher's government is committed to a wider share ownership as part of its privatization policy. The Stock Exchange, looking over its shoulder at the growth of the tax-efficient Business Expansion Scheme, would welcome some real evidence that owning shares is more just anothe pious genuflexion to Victorian

Stern words from Mr Volcker

Mr Paul Volcker, chairman of the US Federal Reserve Board, yesterday gave a warning of signs of "rising inflationary expectations" which could damage the American recovery and must be restrained "at all costs."

Mr Volcker's strong words were addressed to business and labour leaders about the time the Fed's powerful open market committee was meeting in Washington to decide whether to alter the board's credit control policies.

Some economists, noting the recent slowing down in growth of the American economy and the money supply, have been urging the Fed to relax credit policies, to pave the way for lower interest rates which they regard as necessary to sustain the recovery and ease international debt problems. Mr Volcker's remarks suggest, on the contrary, that the policy of flexible, albeit stringent, controls on the money supply will remain unchanged. "We seem to be approaching a new testing point - whether constructive changes in attitude and performance started in adversity can be maintained in prosperity" Mr Volker observed.

Specifically, he said he was worried by a recent wave of wage settlements in some important industries - 6 per cent to 8 per cent and even higher. Settlements have remained low in industries hard-hit by recession but not in other sectors such as finance, utilities and service industries.

"There simply won't be enough money to go around to finance the splurge and the end result would be strong financial pressures, high interest rates and stifled growth", was the Voicker message.

Mr Volcker however, may not have the last word some members of the Reagan administration, worried by the recent slowdown in the economy, will continue to press for a more relaxed monetary policy. They fear that the recovery may fizzle before the presidential elections if the Fed persist with a hard line on credit.

re-assuring boose is timely because the company is working its way through a massive refurbishment gramme which will hold back profits growth in the short term.

The second item of good news in these results is the agrowth in rental income from £51.5m to £56.7m. This increase is considerably greater than it appears for Land Securities sold about £47m worth of property last year and has about 900,000sq ft of space undergoing refurbishment. The rental growth is both potential of the portfolio.

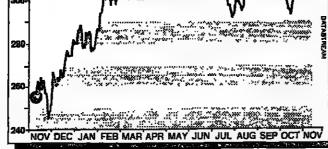

Land Securities is always conservative and says that second half results should be similar to the first. The City expects about £85m this year and abut £92m for 1984-85.

On present showing, prices may not start recovering until he middle of next year. The figures for the 15 months to the end of last year inleuded huge provisions against depreciation of reserve and currency values and currency losses, and the acounting treatment of pro-visions in this year's accounts could make a significant differ ence to the profit figure.

Tackling the New Depression with publicly funded projects

A cautious dose of investment could cure ailing economy

Public sector investment has been the greatest victim of progressive public spending cuts going back to 1976. Have we undermined the economy by adopting this easy way out? Could a selective programme of investment on things only the public sector can do make a powerful contribution to furthering an economic recovery that might otherwise tail off? Or is public just the way to waste huge sums of money without market disciplines? The Times and Coopers & Lybrand, the distinguished accountants and consultants, have come together to sponsor a high-level debate today on public investment and economic recovery.

Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Mr Ian MacGregor, chairman of the National Coal Board, Mr Terrel Wyatt, chairman of Costain and Sir Austin Pearce, chairman of British Aerospace. Here Professor CHRISTOPHER FOSTER sets out the main issues.

now, in every sector except housebuilding, private invest-ment is a higher proportion of gnp than in the 1930s.

Although that cannot be conclusive, experience and common sense suggest that stimulating private business-men to invest more than they would do in their own interest is perilous. Besides, there are immense incentives already. We are left with a last source of more aggregate demand: public investment. There is an astonishing difference between the 1980s and the 1930s. Then public investment fell quickly in the slump but rose strongly from about 1934 onwards, when growth in private investment began to flag. Since 1973 it has fallen by 40 per cent in real terms. There has been a fall in almost every sector except the health service, but the most marked fall has been in construction.

Public investment is now a lower proportion of gnp than in any year since before the First World War.

If one looks for something unprecedentedly between this depression and earlier ones, it is the low level of public investment.

The first is a belief that no project is worth doing the second is to be drawn into a vortex of projects multiplied without discrimination. Such wild imagination is perhaps the inevitable tactic of lobbies. There is a point of principle and another of fact to Keynes argued that useless investment would be better than nothing if it employed people. But the overriding need increase our long-term competitiveness and avoid sector probably has much to learn from best practice in the private sector. One should always assess where the risk will fall. As far as possible one should then privatize or otherwise limit any open ended deficit commitments falling on the taxpayer (except where the risks are rightly the responsibility of government).

The first priority is to accep that something needs to be done to increase public capital formation. Then one must choose the right projects and decide on control and financing arrange-

Even where price and market mechanisms cannot be used and the project, although economi-cally viable, must be financed through taxation, its construction could be privatized under clear contractual controls so as to avoid cost overruns falling on the public sector.

Undoubtedly, there will be projects where there are no economic benefits but where there is a strong social or political case.

These should merely be regarded as equivalent to current public spending in their implications for the public sector borrowing requirement. Now there seems to be a But productive public capital Scylla and Charybdis to avoid, projects should not.

Public investment is now running at low levels probably quite insufficient to maintain our infrastructure. To raise it to the proportions of the 1930s, let alone the early 1970s, could have an effect on national fact that while it may breed contempt, familiarity does not engender baste.

This could be significant, but with the proviso that it may take a few years to get sufficient schemes going. Some preference ought therefore to be given to projects that could be implemented quickly.

But there is nothing to stop the Telecommunications Bill reaching the statute books on schedule by next summer; 2 "guillotine" motion to timetable the debate on the rest of the Bill's passage can be expected shortly to hasten its

More importantly, Lord King's spirited campaign to have British Airways knock British Telecom out of its place in the denstionalization quene has not succeeded. The Treasury, which arbitrates on these matters, has come down firmly on the side of the Department of Trade and Industry, and ruled that the Telecom issue will go ahead as scheduled.

The basic form of the issue has effectively been settled, too. It is a safe bet that despite all the fancy schemes for spreading share ownership which have been dreamt up by the brokers and mercha banks, the Government will in the end opt for a simple flotation of 51 per cent of the equity in a partly paid issue with a loyalty bonus for those who kept their shares for

British Telecom may well be allowed to here subscribers into taking a stake in the business with offers of rebates on telephone bills, but any such scheme will be supplementary rather than integral to the Government issue. Although Lord King has been denied the October slot, the date by which he says the airline will be ready for a stock market quotation, the privati-zation of British Airways next year should not be discounted completely. The Treasury is keeping open the option of fitting it in at some other point in the calendar. This may not be entirely impractical, if one of the wheezes Lord King's competitiveness and avoid inflation seemed less important then.

There must be strong arguments for concentrating on comics at the London School of Covernment debts in the City. ing shadow of the Laker higation in the United States it will be a surprise if Lord King succeeds in going private before Bittish Telecom's Sir George Jefferson

George Jefferson.

Apart from their place in the same queue, there is another common strand linking these two floatations. In botch cases, the Government has been forced to think much harder it originally expected about what exactly it is trying to achieve in privatiz-ing such huge state industries.

If British Caledonian's cheeky bid falls on stony ground, as seems probable, it will not have been in vain.

It may be tiresome for Whitehall to think constructively about what real compe-tition in the airline business should mean, but it is a away some of the mental cobwebs inhabiting many official and ministerial skulls At for British Telecom, it is shaping up to be an even more potent catalyst. Rarely can such a self-evidently important piece of enthusiasm from a Government's supporters, as anyone reading the Hansard debates on the Bill can see for themselves.

The Prime Minister and other ministers have indeed implicitly acknowledged this: their argument for not breaking up the corporation or investigating more radical solutions for the introduction or competition is not that these may not be the optional solutions.

It is the purely pragmatic one that it would take far too long to untangle the accounts, prepare the legal ground for divestment and all the other time-comsuming tasks in-volved in doing the job properly. It is not surprising that the present plan to sell the corporation as a single unit is widely seen as a second best option. While a privatized British Telecom may well be better than an unprivatized British Telecom, the measy regulated duopoly that will replace the present monopoly is patently not worthy of the high-flown rhetoric of competition and efficiency with which the Government invests its privatization policies.

There are clear signs, however, that the lesson is at last being learnt. This is evident not only in the tinkering with British Telecom's regulatory framework, but also in a new-found determination not to fall into the British Telecom trap when it comes to dealing with other great monopolies such as British Gas and the Central Electricity Generating Board.

The exercise that the Government will be undertaking over the next few weeks in reviewing its privatisation options is intended to demonstrate this point.

Stock market punters, lucky enough to draw a few "chips" in the Aspinall Holdings share sale, hit the jackpot yesterday when dealings got underway in the casino company. The shares, against an offer for sale price of 115p, surged to almost 170p at one time and eventually settled at near the 165p mark, pricing the com-

The dramatic scramble for the company's shares was due, in part, to the tantalizing growth prospects held out by the company's casino business. But shrewder stock market investors welcomed the return of Sir James to the "square mile" and were convinced that he will use Aspinall as a takeover vehicle in the leisure field.

Loss of wages award set aside

Courtaulds Northern Spinning when Ltd v Moosa

Before Mr Justice Browne-Wilkinson, Mr L Cowan and Mr Kendall [Judgment delivered November 9]

An employee who had received four years compensation for unfair dismussal notwithstanding the fact that he had been a second to the had been a sec dismissal notwithstanding the fact that he had been employed in another job for nearly 18 months during that period, had his compensation reduced by the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

The employers, Courtailds Northern Spinning Ltd, appealed from a decision of a Manchester industrial tribunal last January, who awarded the anolicent, Mr Ahmed industrial tribunal last January, who awarded the applicant. Mr Ahmed Umerji Moosa, £5,750 compensation for unfair dismissal. They appealed on the grounds that the industrial tribunal had erred in law in finding that there was no contributory conduct by the applicant, in finding that he had not failed to mitigate his loss and in awarding compensation for loss of earnings up to the date of the assessment.

Section 62 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 provides: "(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect in relation to an employee who claims that he has been unfairly dismissed by his employer where at the date of dismissal...(b) the employee was taking part in a strike or other

"(2) In such a case an industrial tribunal shall not determine whether the dismissal was fair or unfair unless it is shown... (b) that unfair unless it is shown... (b) that one or more such employees have been offered re-engagement and that the employee concerned has not been offered re-engagement."

Sections 73(7) and 74(6) of the Act provide for a reduction in compensation where the employee has by his conduct contributed to his districted.

Mr Michael Brindle for the employers: Mr Stephen Sedley, QC for the applicant
MR JUSTICE BROWNE-WILKINSON said that the applicant and others were engaged in an industrial dispute with the employers. They took industrial action which consisted, among other things, of refusing to work through their meal breaks. Working through meal breaks was not the subject matter of the dispute but was just part of the industrial action taken. The industrial tribunal held that there was a contractual obligation on the employees to work through meal breaks and that the applicant was in breach of his contract.

The tribunal found that he was dismissed because he was on strike. Some of the employees had been reengaged. The applicant was never offered re-engagement nor did be apply to be re-engaged. The tribunal found that there had been selective re-engagement within section 62(2)(b) and that he had been

The applicant was dismissed on June 8, 1979. On October 1, 1979 he obtained a new job with another company, Fashion Flow, at a higher salary but on March 21, 1981 he was dismissed for redundancy. After losing that job the applicant remained unemployed until the date tribunal gave their final decision oncompensation.

They awarded the applicant loss of wages from the date of his dismissal to January 14, 1983, a total of 188 weeks. They deducted the agreed earnings from Fashion Flow. They then awarded a further 26 weeks future loss of wages.

In the result the applicant was awarded compensation for loss of his job with the employers for just over four years notwithstanding the fact that during that period he had held a job with Fashion Flow for nearly 18 months.

The employers appealed against the decision on compensation The employers appealed against the decision on compensation

the decision on compensation raising three points:

1 Should the compensation have been reduced under section 74 (6) of the 1978 Act on the ground that he had contributed to his own dismissal since the industrial action for which he was dismissed involved a heach of a term of his involved a breach of a term of his contract of employment?

2 Should the industrial tribunal have found that he failed to mitigate his loss because he never applied to be re-engaged by the employer?

3 Did the industrial tribunal err in awarding him four years loss of wages notwithstanding that he had held another job for nearly 18

The first point involved consideration of two issues; first, whether in a case of unfair dismissal involving a case of uniar dismissal involving selective re-engagement of employees taking part in industrial action, the statutory provisions as to contributory fault related to conduct contributing to the original dismissal or conduct contributing to the failure to re-engage. Second, could an industrial tribunal take into account breaches of contract which were part and parcel of the industrial action.

Counsel for the applicant submitted that where section 62 (3) of the Act applied, which provided that in a case of selective re-engageme references in certain sections to the reason for dismissal should be read as references to the reason for a failure to offer re-engagement, the contributory fault to be considered under sections 73(7) and 74(6) had to be conduct contributing to the failure to re-engage not conduct contributing to the original dis-

But the Act could not be construed so as to reach that result. In a case of selective re-engagement an applicant's complaint remained a complaint that be was unfairly dismissed not that he was unfairly refused re-engagement.
Even in the case of selective re-engagement the relevant question was whether the employee had contributed to his dismissal not to his failure to be re-engaged.

The second question was whether in applying section 74(6) to a case when the industrial tribunal assessed the compensation.

The delays in disposing of the applicants claim were appalling and wholly untypical of the majority of cases. The first decision that the dismissal was unfair was on September 12, 1980.

There was an appeal and further industrial tribunal hearings and on January 14, 1983 the industrial tribunal gave their final decision on compensation.

They awarded the applicant loss of wages from the date of his dismissal to January 14, 1983.

a breach of contract as in the present case, it would have to enter precisely the area from which Parliament desired to exclude it.

desired to exclude it.

The appeal tribunal concluded that it was not possible for an industrial tribunal to hold under section 74(6) that the industrial action in which an employee was taking part, whether or not it was in breach of contract, in itself justified a reduction in compensation since an industrial tribunal was unable to determine whether or not it was just and equitable to make such reduction.

The industrial tribunal was correct not to reduce the applicant's compensation since it could not properly hold that the industrial action in which he was taking part involved a breach of contract.

involved a breach of contract.

On the question whether the applicant had failed to mitigate his loss because he never applied to be re-engaged by the employee, it might well be reasonable for an employee not to seek re-employment with an employer who had recently dismissed him and the evidence failed to show that had he applied he would in fact have been re-engaged. The tribunal's decision was correct.

The final must concerned the The tribunal's decision was correct.

The final point concerned the duration of compensation. The compensation awarded by the industrial rribunal made the employers liable to compensate the applicant for not having a job during the period after he lost his new job with Fashion Flow.

In most cases where there was no inordinate delay in assessing compensation such a question could not arise. In practice industrial not arise. In practice industrial tribunals assessed the loss down to the date of assessment by treating the employer as liable for loss of against that amount any earnings which the employee had received from other employment. In practice it was assumed as to the future that the original the future that the original employer's liability ceased once equivalent permanent employment was obtained.

As to past loss, in practice is usually made little financial difference whether the loss was treated as coming to an end when new permanent employment was obtained or was treated as continuing down to the date of assessment, the employee being required to bring into account his earnings from the new employment.

But when a long period had clapsed between dismissal and the date of assessment the two approaches could produce different

On the facts of the present case it was impossible to say as section 74(1) required that the applicant's loss of wages after his dismissal was attributable to action taken by the employers. It was attributable to action taken by Fashion Flow in action taken by Fashion Flow in diamissing the applicant.

Apart from authority, the appeal tribunal would hold that the employers were not hable for any loss of wages after the applicant obtained his employment with Fashion Flow.

The authority relied on by counsel for the applicant was Ging v Elhward Lancs Lid (1978) 13 ITR 265) which apparently conflicted with the appeal tribunal's view.
But in the judgment in that case there was no reference to any argument based on lack of causation, the critical point it did not decide that in all cases causation, the critical point. It due not decide that in all cases irrespective of causation, loss of wages were to be awarded down to the date of assessment.

Accordingly, loss of wages should only have been awarded down to October 1, 1979 when the applicant obtained his new employment with obtained his new employment with Fashion Flow, and the industrial tribunal's assessment should be set aside. The appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to the industrial tribunal to assess compensation. Leave to appeal would be granted, Solicitors: Mr Dillon Weston; Mr wages down to that date but setting J. Pickering Oldham.

Meaning of 'absolutely' for trust income

Kenny and Others v Cunning-bam-Reid and Others

The word "absolutely", when it appeared in an appointment of income under a trust in favour of a number of named appointees, was intended to indicate that the vested interests in income given by the appointment to each of the appointment to each of the appointment should be indefeasible, thus excluding the provisions of section 31(2) of the Trustee Act 1025 section 31(2) of the Prusice Act 1925.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Waller, Lord Justice Stade and Lord Justice Robert Goff) so held on November 10, allowing an appeal by the defendant benefici-aries against that part of the where an employee had been dismissed while taking part in an judgment of Mr Justice Goulding on July 15, 1981, in which he declared that the provisions of section 31(2) of the 1925 Act applied to the trusts declared by the appointment made on February 19, 1971, by the plaintiff trustees. LORD JUSTICE SLADE said that it had been pointed out by Chief Justice Herring in the Australian case In re Thompson ([1947] VLR 60, 67) that the word "absolutely" was commonly used with regard to vesting as meaning "indefeasibly", and his Lordship would add that that was the clear force of the word as used in exclusions. force of the word as used in sections 31(2)(i) and 31(4) of the Trustee Act 1925 itself.

Dismissed nurse wins judicial review

Regina v East Berkshire Health Authority, Ex parte Walsh

Before Mr Justice Hodgson [Judgment delivered November 11]

it was not an abuse of the process of the court to apply for judicial review of a decision of a public authority alleging that a dismissal by that authority was unlawful and by that authority was unlawful and unfair.

His Lordship so held in the Queen's Bench Division in granting as a preliminary point leave to Mr Paul Anthony Walsh to apply for judicial review for a declaration and order of certionari to quash the purported dismissal of the applicant by the East Berkshire Health Authority, and to quash the continuance of the appeal hearings by that authority and the findings there takes.

giving the reserved judgment of the court, said that the applicant had been appointed senior nursing officer (psychiatry) at the Wexham Park Hospital within the control of the respondents in July 1981.

During that year conflict arose industrial tribunal complaining of between the medical and nursing staff over the legality of administering certain neatments to patients were held in abeyance pending the House of Lords in O'Reilly values of Lords in O'Re ing certain reatments to patients admitted under section 26 of the Mental Health Act 1959 who

Mental Health Act 1959 who objected to such treatment being given. A committee of inquiry set up to investigate those matters included in its findings (the Camp. report) the establishment of serious misconduct by the applicant and recommended his dismissal. Prior to that report, a dispute occurred between the applicant and the district noising officer relating to treatment of a patient which calminated in the applicant's suspension. After a disciplinary hearing the applicant's employment was purported to be terminated because of his misconduct and also because of the findings of the Camp REPORT

An appeal hearing was held by the authority, and in the course of that, the applicant applied for leave to apply for judicial review. The appeal committee upheld his dismissal which was accepted by the respondents. The regional health authority exercised its discretion not to hear the ambiguart's agreed. to hear the applicant's appeal.

Mr Walsh had also applied to the decision of this court.

Mr Morson argued that the application should be dismissed as an abuse of the process of the court; the relationship between the parties arose only out of contract, it existed only in the private law field and was wholly outwith public law so that the respondent's dealings in relation to its nursing staff were not subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the court.

Mr Bowyer submitted that the applicant's employment by the respondents was under a stantory framework, the National Health Service Act 1977, and by paragraph 10 (1) of Schedule III of the Act the terms of employment had to be in accordance with regulations and directions given by the secretary of state. Therefore, in performing its disciplinary functions in relation to the applicant, the respondents were performing a public duty affecting the rights of the applicant in public.

Imprisoning for contempt in the face of the court

Regina v Newbary Justices, Exparte do Pont and Others

Before Lord Justice May and Mr Justice Hodgson [Judgment delivered November 11]

Action taken by justices under section 12(1) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 to commit to custody persons who wilfully interrupted the proceedings of the court did not amount to a symmetry consistion by the gracierates' court conviction by the magistrates' court for the purposes of section 21 of the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973 which imposed restrictions on passing sentences of imprisonment

Miss Helena Kennedy for the LORD JUSTICE MAY said that the justices, in the face of a serious disturbance in the court room, had instructed police officers to take into custody the 11 women involved. The justices retired for 15 minutes, took legal advice from their clerk and then dealt with each of the 11 women separately. The justices ordered that eight women, who declined to apologise, should be committed for 14 days

One of the grounds of natural justice alleged was that none of the women was given the opportunity for legal representation. There was a member of the Bar in court who had advised one of the women who was ber client and who on that advice,

It was submitted that if the could not succeed on that basis, justices had observed the rules of Should similar circumsta natural justice and seen to it that the women did have legal representation, the member of the Bar would have advised them that the proper course was to apologise.

This was a serious contempt in the face of the court preventing it from carrying on its business and it had to be dealt with swiftly and firmly. In the circumstances, the requirements of natural justice did not require the justices to see to it that any of the allocate consenues. not require the justices to see to it that any of the alleged contempors were afforded a right to legal representation. It was submitted that the applicants would be prejudiced by that record. Now that the sentences had been completed, it was wrong for the court and pointless to exercise its discretion to allow any order None of the complaints alleging a failure to comply with the rules of natural justice succeeded and the application would be dismissed.

Successive adjournments of care proceedings which resulted in the making of successive 28-day interim making of successive 28-day interim care orders relating to minors made under the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 without the hearing of evidence were not in the best interests of the child. The projected abandonment of the British championship, contrived by England and Scotland for essentially contributed to the contribute of mercial ends, threatens not merely the financial stability of Wales and Northern Ireland. In the long term it will jeopardize the unique and historic position of influence still tenuously held by the four home associations on the law-making international Board and in the political battle to prevent soccer being dominated even more than now by the South American-Latin axis. The vigour with which Ernie Walker and Ted Croker, the not care about Wales - who, wih Ireland, provide many useful Football League players — was increased when discussion about the televising of England's friendly with France next February appeared to overlook that it clashed within 24 hours with Scotland v Wales. The FA cannot complain if their attitude with overpriced tickets and that ghastly commercialized shirt suggest they are running a supermarket instead of a sport. It is hardly surprising that for redirectant to support the FA's wish to install their chairman, Bert Millichip, within FIFA's ranks in place of Irelands's Harry Caven - no matter that Cavan's utter failure to insist on fair play for the United States in last summer's haggling over the 1986 World Cup yeane was shamefal.

It is sad that Britain's worthy attempt to do something about widespread cheating on the field, sending-off for tactical fouling and handling, was squashed by the FIFA president, João Havelange, whose grip on the world game is a dire development. group six clash. Kari-Heinz Rumminigge, cap

Karl-Heinz Rumminigge, captain, is suffering from a niggling thigh injury but is expected to play. But Michael, his younger brother, has been withdrawn from the squad because of a shump in his form. Bayern Munich, his club, were unhappy at him getting so much international exposure after only two months in senior football.

Belgium and Portugal have aircady joined France, the hosts, in the next year's finals as winners of the next year's finals as winners of groups one and two respectively, sponsorship during the past three years to £50,000. The under 24 return match will The under 24 return match will take piace at Oldham on December 4, and a squad of 24 players will report for special training at Oldham tomorrow week. The 17-man squad from whom the team will be aclected, will have further training and fitness tests on the following Wednesday afternoon, would rest on an exciting goal-scramble against the Maltese.

Tommy Caton's international ambitions are benind the transfer request he has made to Manchester and last night. "I have nothing against the club. I just think that my England chances are not being helped by playing in the Second Division."

to look on By Nicholas Harling If the English Basketball Association are having a snigger at the plight of Fine Ceramics Bohon, the Lancashire club would probably tell them to carry on laughing. Without a coach or a win in the National League, sponsored by Wimpey Homes, Bolton might have been expected to be regretting their exhaustive efforts during the summer to gain promotion to the first division. As second division above investigably thought this division. As second threat champions they justifiably thought they had every right but it was only after they had threatened to sue the PBRA that Bolton were belatedly Now, after a season in which they Hempstead.

But Bolton do not have any regrets. "How could we, a club that has only been in existence two years and three months, have any regrets: and three months, have any regrets, when we are able to bring all the big chubs here." Alan Jeffers, their secretary and founder, said: "It is great or us, a real bonus." Since Bolton have averaged more points a garies than several clubs, Crystal Palace included, and have lost several matches by narrow margins, Jeffers feets it is not unrealistic to expect them to win several of their remaining games if they tighten up defensively.

He is also hopeful of signing Leroy Casanova, who has been released by Doncaster where he did not come up to expectations.

While a biting north wind whipped across the Kent countryside and made footcountryside and made toot-stamping and finger-blowing the order of the day for Folkestone race-goers, two of the sport's best-loved sons - one equine, one human - ensured that hearts at least were the coupling hearts at least were thoroughly warmed yesterday. The sight of Silver Buck gaining the thirtieth victory of his outstanding career in the Whitelaw Gold Cup and Frank Hill Snally action. Frank Hill finally achieving a singularly clusive 100th win after 55 years as an owner, was surely worth more than a little hardship.

In taking his record winnings for, a Nauonal Hunt horse to over £160,000-Silver Buck may not have looked as utterly dominant against three moderate rivals as his supporters must have hoped. Robert Earnshaw, his jockey, had to give him a couple of slaps down the neck between the last two fences to make him stretch-out ahead of Iden Green. However, he gave a faultless and occasionally breathtaking display of jumping and as Earnshaw pointed out afterwards, the old horse never exerts himself any more than is strictly necessary.

William Haggas, the jointowner's son, endorsed this by pointing out that when Silver Buck won this same race three years ago, Earnshaw had also has to rouse him to beat Havanus. He then met the same horse a couple of weeks later at Haydock Park on 35lb worse terms and still came out on top. That Haydock race, the Edward Hanmer Chase, which Silver Buck has won for the last four year, will almost certainly be his objective again in nine days' time. William Hill quote him at 9-1 to win a second

Cheltenham Gold Cup. As for Mr Hill, now in his 81st year, he must have begun to believe that someone up there had personally intervened to prevent him ever reaching his century. Win No 99 had

A happy return for Francome

John Franconie, out of action for three weeks with a back injury, returned to win the Staveley Handicap Chase on odds-on favourite Plundering, at Wolverhampton yesterday. The Coplow tried to lead all the way but Plundering took his measure four fences from home.

At the next fence the favourite was headed by Bashful Lad but Francome rallied Plundering and they jumped to the front again at the last. Although the pair came close on the run-in, Plundering had the situation well under control and beat Bashful Lad two and a half lengths. At Cartisle, John O'Neill rode one of his best finishes this season to win the Patterdale Handicap Chase on Man Alive. Three To One and Man Alive had a rare tussle over the last three fences but Man Alive jumped the last ahead and held on by a neck.

Barnes takes Halliday's place against All Blacks

By David Hands Rugby Correspondent

Rugby Correspondent

The injury to the unfortunate Simon Halliday has forced the South and South West Division to recast their plans for today's game at the Bristol Memorial Ground against the New Zealanders and, conceivably, not only the Division. England may well have contemplated awarding Halliday his first cap on Saturday; the side to play New Zealand will be announced immediately after today's game.

The divisional selectors have introduced Barnes, the Oxford University and Bristol stand off, into the centre position which Halliday was to have occupied, exchanging one Oxford Blue for another in what must be regarded as a calculated gamble. Barnes, who will be 21 later this month, has played full back as well as half back, but seldom centre.

Thought was given to moving Mogg from the left wing to the position he occupied for Gioucester. But perhaps, with visions of Rugherford and Campbell playing Rugherford and Campbell playing together for the British Lions during the summer, the selectors felt that Barnes's undoubted footballing talent would enable him to settle swiftly to his new chores and introduce further attacking options, once the educated boot of Horton had carried the divisional side deep into All Black services. into All Black territory.

On the whole, there is little sign that present pressure for a more democratic regime is within measurable distance of overthrowing the traditional system. But the Clyde cannot be fitted into the traditional system.

Two bundred years ago the Clyde was as fendal as the Spey. But a fendal regime cannot be rebuilt when its entire basis has disappeared. Great estates have been fragmented, mines and factories and towns have proliferated, and the landscape is crise-crossed with roads and railways and bridges, all with legal title to land. Who owns the fishing

"I have had informal meetings

"I have had informal meetings already with some sponsors and 1 have now written to some of the larger sports sponsors asking them to meet and discuss how such a scheme might be set up and operated", he said.

"I hope that the meeting can be arranged quickly and that we can press on argently. If only a few per cent — 3 per cent or 4 per cent, or perhaps 5 per cent — were to be creamed off in this way the impact could be enormous.

"On the basis of the figures I gave earlier, that would give an annual injection of £3m, £4m or even £5m to the development of sport at grass roots each year",

Mr Macfarlane said that all too

Mr Mactarlane said that all too often sponsors' money was sticking at the elite levels of many sports, leaving the grass roots with the 'small change'. "Yet in all sports there is a need for extra resources at the family and jumior levels, and to improve coaching", he said.

CARLTON CHALLENGE at Mountpatter SC Portsmouth

LACROSSE: Middlesex, with nine internationals in their side, were strongly challenged by Surrey in the women's south counties tournament at Claremont School, Esher at the weekend but sained a narrow 3-2 victory, Peter Tatlow writes. In their 12-1 defeat of Sussex, Middlesex displayed some shoddy passing, while Surrey recovered possession remarkably well from mistakes. In the other match, Surrey best Surrey 2-3. The match, Surrey beat Sussex 8-3. The all-England counties final will be played at Lady Eleanor Holles school, Hampton, on Saturday.

MARATHON: Waldemar Cier-panski of East Germany, twice Olympic champion, will be among the runners in the eighteenth Fukuoka international marathon on December 4, the Japan Amateur Athletic Federation said yesterday.

FOOTBALL: Eric England, secretary of Sheffield Wednesday, is to retire after 47 years with the club.

Now aged 63, he went to Hillsborough as office boy and became secretary in 1974. TENNIS: Chris Lloyd on Sunday beat Bounie Gadusck, a fellow American, 6-0, 6-4 to win the $125,000 (£25,000) Deerfield Beach tennis tournament in Florida for the fourth year running.

A nine stone "hero" who bridges the great Irish divide

McGuigan makes the border melt into irrelevance

He stands 5ft 6in and weighs nine stones but Northern Ireland's lastest "hero" Barrie McGuigan demonstrates once again that in sport religious divisions and the border can melt

Orange or green; tricolour or Union flag? It makes little difference to the Irish when they are applauding a home grown champion. As one British minister said while watching Roman Catholics and Protestants deliriously cheering together after one of McGuigan's sporting successes: "Whatever that man has got to bring them together, I wish I had it."

McGuigan, the 22-year-old featherweight boxing champion is being tipped as the next European champion and with a 5ft 10in reach. his devastating striking power has delighted boxing fans. When he meets Valerio Nati for the vacant European title tomorrow for 7,500 spectators from both northern Ireland and the Republic, McGuigan will become the latest in a line of men and women whose achievements have united, albeit briefly, both sides of the sectarian divide while also making the border appear an irrelevance.

His manager, Barney Eastwood, said: "It's a night when all denominations from whatever part of Norther Ireland unite under the banner of sport. It's great to see the people coming out again and to see the Northern Ireland people agreeing about some bloody thing."

In recent year Mary Peters, and the Northern Ireland football team, whose efforts in the last World Cup resulted in deserted streets across the province as people watched their progress on television, have received tumultuous receptions from a people longing to show another face to a world that knows them only for savage violence.

An Irish women's hockey team consisting of six players from Northern Ireland and nin from the Republic of Ireland returned earlier this year from a successful tour of the Far East while an exodus of northern fans went south to Dublin for rugby internationals. Many "loyalists" may want the British link but in sport they shout loudest for Ireland. "It used to be embarrassing the way they cheered so loudly," said Neil Blaney, a staunchly republican deputy from Donceal. McGuigan and his place of birth epitomise the nature of the border drawn 60 years ago. He was born in Clones, which is part of a historic region of Ulster but is outside the Six County state by about 500 yards. As his parents were born in Co. Tyrone in Northern Ireland, he has dual nationality and as a youth criss-crossed the border to train before representing Northern Ireland in the 1978 Commonwealth Games where he won a gold medal as a bantamweight.

Two years later at the Olympics in Moscow he was representing the Republic of Ireland but since turning professional has fought for the British title "because it means something in the world of boxing. To him the border dividing the north and the republic is clearly an irrelevance as he crosses it most weeks when he returns from his adopted home in Co Down to visit his parents.

McGuigan: home grown champion viewing Europe.

None of the fans who have watched his progress through 18 professional bouts appear to care that he is a Roman Catholic from across the border. To them he is "the Clones Cyclone" and tomorrow they will be anxiously hoping he lifts the European title on a night of major importance for the province's sporting fans as Northern Ireland are playing West Germany in a European championship football match.

A slight, shy young man, he is aware of Northern Ireland sensibilities and wears a neutral blue robe to enter the ring. "I've had a great reception in the Falls Road and then across in the Shankill. The Northern Ireland crowd is second to none and there's never been any trouble at a fight. Whatever their religion doesn't matter when they're watching me fight."

He has won all of his 17 bouts as a professional and it is perhaps his "ordinariness" and the character he displayed during the last year that has endeared him to his supporters. A tectotalier and non smoker, the greatest of his character came last year when a Nigerian boxer he beat in London died later in hospital. He is still unhappy to talk about that incident, saying quickly. I went through that experience and made my decision to continue boxing. McGuigan knows the fleeting unity seen at his bouts frequently evaporates as the spectators

Sunday play abandoned for 1984 Tests

After depressingly small attendances last summer - 4,000 at Trent Bridge and 5,600 at the Oval 2 Sunday play in Test matches in England has been discontinued. Introduced in 1981 for the first Test against Australia at Trent Bridge and tried on seven subsequent occasions, it has never attracted the public support needed to compensate for the additional costs of staging cricket on Sundays or to assuage the clash of interest with the game's longest current sponsors, John Player, who support the counties' Sunday not among the drugs banned by the International Olympic Committee There are no accepted testing procedures for it and existing medical research is limited.

The Los Angeles Times reported at the weekend that IOC's medical commission, found traces of the hormone somatropin in Urine samples studied at his laboratory in

There is no team competition at Los Angeles and as Britain did not enter the team event in Strasbourg they will not receive a new world ranking until the next world meeting in two years' time. At the Manich championships in 1981, the British girls were ranked nineteenth. With even higher standards established at Strasbourg, modern rhythmic gymmatics is expected to receive a great boost to its popularity in Los Angeles, particularly as it is based on dance and does not make the pysical demands of conventional Cologne.
Some Physicians and athletes believe sometropin enhances size and strength more than anabolic steroids or pure testosterone. It is also believed to have fewer side and believes to have lever since effects and passes through the body far more quickly, so users run less risk of determion.

"This is an elite drug in track-and-field competition today," said Dr. Robert Kerr, a sports-medicine expect in San Gabriel who has prescribed the drug to athletics for Somatropin, sometimes pre-scribed for children whose pituriary glands don't produce enough of it, is derived from the pituitary glands of human cadavers, it's a successor to a similar hormone taken from monkeys in past years and used by weightlifters and bodybuilders. Kerr, noting the widspread publicity about athletes using publicity about athletes using hormones and steroids, said, "The really elite athletes aren't taking these products, or rarely take these products. They come to see me and haven't taken testosterone in a year.

but I take sometropin."

The hormone's effects are realized a few months after injection. "Sometropin is known for its permanency of effect," said Kerr." If you stop taking a male hormone (steroid or testosterone), you're going to lose a certain percentage of the gains in strength and size, but with somatropin, the gains tend to stay."

The IOC has confirmed that officials have agreed to test athletes fro excess testosterone and caffeine at the games in Los Angeles next

Super Secretaries

Secretaries Work abroad with the Diplomatic Service

Secretarial work for well trained shorthand typists in the Department of State responsible for British interests abroad.

On joining, you will work in the Foreign and Commonwealth. Office in London, engaged in normal secretarial duties. Then, after about a year (or longer depending on your age), you will be posted overseas. This could take you to Embassies or High Commissions anywhere in the world - from Paris to Moscow Caracas or the Cayman Islands - with opportunities for more varied and interesting work.

To apply, you must be a British citizen, at least 18 years of age. with a minimum of 100wpm in shorthand and 30wpm in typing. Knowledge of foreign languages is not essential but is an asset.

Starting salary in London will be from £5220 to £5581 – rising to £6136, or if you have three years relevant secretarial experience and 3 'O' levels (including English Language), from £6136 - rising to £7242. Extra proficiency allowances of up to £1074 may be earned for higher shorthand and typing speeds. There are also opportunities for promotion to higher positions. Overseas postings carry extra allowances, including an allowance to meet higher cost of living where applicable, with fully furnished accommodation provided and extra local leave.

For further details and an application form, contact Secretarial Recruitment, Personnel Policy Department, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, 3 Central Buildings, Matthew Parker Street, London SW1. Telephone: 01-233 4388/3512.

The fourth in Robert Lacey's perceptive series THE ARISTOCRATS (BBC2 9.30 pm) features Prince Franz Josef II of Liechtenstein, a man who is literally lord of all he surveys and has been for 45 years. From his fairy tale castle nearched high. castle parched high on a crag overlooking Vaduz, the capital. Prince Franz Josef can see all the prosperous 64 square miles of his alpine principality, stuck between Switzerland and Austria, the third richest country in the world with its 26,006 population enjoying a standard of living that is bettered by only Kuwatt and the United Arab Emirates. But the Prince's reign almost came to a halt before it had time to start when, in 1938, the country was eyed enviously by Adolf Hitler. Prince Franz's account of his threequarter hour Berlin. meeting with the Fuhrer illustrates yet another facet of the complex.

Hume asks Kent to explain CND speech

Continued from page 1 was happy to see the cardinal, and had not intended to cause him difficulties. "I go to see him quite often," he said. "But I do not withdraw one remark I made, not a word."

Meanwhile the chairman of the Conservative Party, Mr John Selwyn Gummer, said Kent was "either congeniconfused or purposely ". Multilateralists and unilateralists "can now united go. His judgment endangers us all". in one thing: Bruce Kent must Significantly the Archbishop of Liverpool, Mgr Derek Worlock, who is vice-president of the English Roman Catholic Bishop's Congress, also expressed doubts about Mgr Kent's speech. He also expected Cardinal

Hume to raise the issue of Mgr Kent's position witht eh Roman Catholic bishops of England and Wales, who began their autumn meeting in London last

Cardinal Hume, announcing that he had written to Mgr Kent, also distanced himself from Mgr Kent's message to the Communist Party. "He speaks in his own name and not on behalf of the Roman Catholic Church", the cardinal said.

Mr Eric Heffer, chairman of the Labour Party, said Mgr Kent was the victim of McCarthyite tactics. "It is clear that once again our media is determined to prove that those who are for peace and against nuckear weapons are agents of the Soviet Union. It is a lie."

Mgr Kent said he did not see his comments on the Quakers and the Communist Party as a disciplinary matter.

Asked if he would step down as general secretary of CND if Cardinal Hume asked him to, he said: "He has not withdrawn my position, to work or CND and I am not crossing any bridges until I come to them". Mr David Isiorho, regional vice-chairman of CND in the West Midlands, resigned as a protest against the remarks of Mgr Kent in his support for the Communist Party (Arthur Osman writes).

 The CND last night greeted the arrival in Greenham Common of cruise missiles by saying it would make their deployment both physically and politically impossible (Nicholas Timmins writes).

Mrs Joan Ruddock, chairman of CND, said the arrival of the missiles was not the end of the battle "but the beginning of a new phase of the peace

Greenham women promise to keep base under siege

Scores of Greenham women stood silently around camp fires yesterday to listen to the radio broadcast of the formal announcement by Mr Michael Heseltine, Secretary of State for Defence, that the first cruise missiles had arrived in Few women had seen the Starlifter plane carrying the missiles, but many had been woken from a fitful sleep by the noise of the plane. By the time Mr Heseltine rose in the Commons, the news had sunk and the women were exhibiting a grim determination to continue their fight.

Their promise of a campaign of civil disobedience to stop the missiles being transported out of the base could result in a confrontation as soon as dispersal training - practice runs to site missiles on private land the throughout

The women said they were prepared to dig up roads, slash tyres, and block roads with felled trees and boulders to prevent the cavalcade of ve-hicles that would be needed to transport the cruise missiles to their launching sites.

Mrs Jane Dunnett, a grandother who has lived at Greenham Common for more than a year, said that women of all ages were prepared to break the law, and that the Government would need every member of the British police and armed forces to stop their campaign. More women from all over

Mr Kinnock in his statement pledged the Laobour Party to continue to oppose the escala-tion of the nuclear arms race. "I warn the Prime Minister that the British people will not forgive her for allowing first-use nuclear weapons to be deployed in Britain, especially when the American Government which owns and controls those weapons has so recently and so obviously shown its contempt for the views of the British Government.

He later said that cruise would make the country more of a target for "saturation nuclear attack".

The Opposition attack in the Commons was led by Mr John Silkin, who suggested that Mr Heseltine had not known earlier in the day that the missiles were arriving.

Mr Heseltine later told journalists that he, not the Americans, had decided that the missiles should arrive yester-

 Beyond announcing that the first of the cruise missiles had arrived at Greenham, Mr Heseltine has refused to disclose any details (Rodney Cowton, Defence Correspondent, writes).

He refused to tell journalists how many had arrived, or whether the nuclear warheads had arrived with them, though it is highly likely that they have He did not expect to make any further statements before operational deployment had been

The missiles are due to become operationally available by the end of the year, but the Government will probably want to be able to announce that operational capability has been achieved before the Commons rises for Christmas, possibly around December 15.

Victory in "defeat", page 12

Greenham Commons weapon deployed

The Americans went ahead yesterday with the operational deployment of Mr Michael

The massive, meanacing shape that is the Heseltine was trundled to the despatch box one of the most advanced politicians in the modern Conservative Party; advanced (according to envious critics) many levels above his just desserts.

His landing yesterday, to make the announcement to MPs that cruise missiles had arrived at Greenham Common, Berkshre from the United States, was preceded by a news blackout. Indeed, it was suggested on the Labour benches that Mr Hesletine himself was kept in the dark. This he denied. Every time Mr Heseltine talked about the decision having been taken that the first cruise missiles should reach Greenham Common yesterday, Labour members shouted: "When? When?

Mr Heseltine had begun his statement by saying that, at the end of the debate on October 31, the House had reaffirmed by a majority of 144 its support, among other things for the operational deployment of cruise missiles
After some technical talk about "transporter-erectorabout "transporter-erector-launchers" and suchlike having already arrived, Mr Heseltine broke the news to which hysterics throught Britain, but particularly those camping out in Berkshire, had long been looking forward. ... I should inform the House that earlier today the first cruise missiles were delivered by air to Greenham Common.

This provoked opposition cries of "shame", and indeed, from the more time-serving centre and right of the party, shamed cries of opposition. Mr Heseltine sat down to a cheer from the Conservative benches. But on the other side of he House, the Westminster peace men vowed to continue the fight.

One of their number thust himself forward as their spokesman. He was Mr John Silkin, of London SW1, an ordinary husband and father, who would like nothing better than to carry on his trade as a solicitor specializing in prop-erty, but who had been forced become shadow Secretary for Defence in protest at Mr Michael Heseltine. His complaint appeared to be that Mr Heseltine, rather than himself, was the real Secretary for

Like many idealists. Mr

Silkin may have lacked th ability to express himself.
"The truth is it remains the watershed, this American decision, he found himself saying at one stage yesterday. But there was no denying the sincerity with which he was opposed to the fact that Mr Heschine, rather than himself, was Secretary for Defence:

And before long this simple solicitor began to show prowcal arts. He set out on an effort to prove that Mr Heseltine had not much more to de with the timing of the missiles' arrival than did the rest of us. In this, he had quite a lot of

"does the Secretary of State really know what is going on?". rather controversially shouted: "Yes." Mr Silkin continued: "he does? Then why did he have to be called back from Aldershot to make this state-ment. Dies it not show that the Americans have not even told him the date or time that missiles would be delivered?"

Mr Heseltine did not deny having been in Aldershot But he seemed reluctant to discuss the reason for his early departure from that agreeable town. In reply to Mr Silkin, he talked about other matters. Mr Silkin rose again and asked:
"Could be explain why he had to be called back from Aldershot?

Eventually, Mr. Heseltine referred to "the commitment I felt to the large numbers of people at Aldershot who were looking forward to my visit." This immodest remark provoked hughter on both sides of the House. For it conjured up a picture of schoolchildren who had been given a half-holiday in order to line Aldershot's streets with their union jacks and welcome Mr. Heseltine, a figure second only to the Princess of Wales in their affections. Because of his early departure, many who never saw him were now weeping, as was the town's Conservative MP Mr Julian Critchley, who had been practising his curts, all weekend, for it was he who had been deputed to present Mr Heseltine with a bouquet. The fulminations covered subjects even graver than discourtesy to Aldershor. Mr Michael Foot, rising from retirement, talked of shameful surrender". He wore a new woolly green jacket, surely his choice for the Cenotaph this year had he been allowed to be there.

The Daily Star comments:
"Millions of Roman Catholics will be dismayed and outraged by the spectacle of Monsignor Bruce Kent allying himself with the Communist Party ... How can anybody who talks so warmly and fulsomely about a creed which is so fundamentally alien to Western democracy expect to retain his position – never mind his credibility – within a Christian order."

The San comments on the cruise

The San comments on the cruise missiles at Greenham: "The few who are against the nuclear shield have sought to alarm the many who are in favour by suggesting that Britain has no control over the firing of cruise. This is untrue. The decision over launching cruise is governed by agreements between Washington and London dating back to the 1950s . . . The Americans are here because we invited them . They are the foremost guardians of our liberty and the security of all Europe. They have never failed us in the past. We The Daily Mirror comments that the arrival of cruise missiles is chilling news, "a reality, not a slogan". The newspaper adds that Monsigner Bruce Kent's view of the Communist Party as "a partner in peace" is like saying that "spiders are the partners of flies. Cruise is another weapon in a dangerous world. By itself, it doesn't make the world more dangerous. And cer-tainly not as dangerous as disarming the West and relying on the good faith of the Soviet Union." The New York Times spoke yesterday of disturbing distortions accounting for the unexpected plunge in the US unemployment rate in October. One was the unexplained disappearance of half a million job seekers: "They weren't employed, but they weren't looking
